Most Israelis would accept peace deal, poll finds

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

Three-quarters of Hebrew-speaking Israelis would support a peace agreement with the Palestinians based on the Arab peace initiative, and more than half would vote for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu if he were to leave the Likud party and create a new party, according to a new poll published Feb 27.

The survey, commissioned by the non-profit Israeli Peace Initiative (IPI), was conducted earlier this month among a representative sample of 500 Hebrew-speaking Israelis. The poll's sponsors said it indicated that a large majority of the country's Jews hold hawkish views regarding the peace process but would be willing to accept a deal if they understood what Israel stands to gain from an accord normalizing diplomatic and trade relations with the entire Arab world.

First adopted by the Arab League in 2002, the Arab peace initiative promises Israel "full diplomatic and normal relations" with 57 Arab and Muslim states, in exchange for a "comprehensive peace agreement" with the Palestinians. Israeli leaders have so far reacted mostly coldly to the initiative, unhappy about some of its terms.

According to the survey, 76 per cent of respondents said they are "sure" or "think" that they would be willing to support an agreement after they were told about nine different elements of the deal, all based on the Arab peace initiative, presented to them in a way that made them seem beneficial to Israel. More than 60 per cent of respondents said they would likely support a regional peace treaty even before any components of it were discussed.

"This represents a statistically significant increase over the findings in other surveys conducted over the past few months," according to the authors of the survey.

"The significance of this poll shows that a) Israelis indeed hold right-wing views, b) they don't believe the Palestinians, c) they will accept a far-reaching deal based on the Arab peace initiative if presented properly to them, and d), that they will support Netanyahu if he does make such a heroic decision," said IPI's Koby Huberman in a conference call with reporters Thursday.

More than half of the poll's respondents said they consider themselves either "extreme right wing" (28 per cent) or "soft right" (24 per cent). About 30 per cent define their political position as centrist and 16 per cent as either "soft left" or "extreme left."

Last week's poll presented respondents with what Huberman called a "legitimate interpretation" of the Arab peace initiative, though not with its exact wording. Some of the terms presented to the respondents included the creation of a demilitarized Palestine, settlements remaining under Israeli sovereignty with only "minor territorial exchanges," east Jerusalem as capital, no right of return for Palestinian refugees (with the exception of "a symbolic number"), security arrangements to protect against Iran and terror, and the promise that economic access to "300 million consumers and a billion residents (in the Arab and Muslim world) will improve the situation of Israeli citizens."

Flag vandalized during BDS vote campaign

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. — Police are continuing their investigation into vandalism at the University of Windsor that has been described as a hate crime.

The vandalism took place over the night of Feb. 26-27 – the eve of a controversial and successful campus boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) vote – and the target was one of the student association's vice-presidents.

Jacob DeJong, the University of Windsor Students' Alliance's (UWSA) vice-president of academic affairs, showed up for work on Thursday morning only to find his office in disarray and a Support Our Troops flag pinned to the wall desecrated with spray paint spelling out "Zionist" and a drawing of the Star of David.

"My first response was to back out of the office without touching anything and call the campus police," he said.

DeJong, a native of Windsor and a former military reservist, called the vandalism "a slap in the face to myself and any other members of the military."

DeJong, who is not Jewish, thinks the flag might have been targeted because "not everyone is supportive of some of the events that happened in Afghanistan or Iraq or the intervention in the Middle East."

But he may have also personally been a lightning rod. DeJong said he didn't express an opinion either way during the campaign leading up to the BDS vote – which was endorsed by Windsor undergraduates 798 to 585 – but he did repeatedly criticize the legitimacy of the ballot question "because it was biased, it has some misleading statements, it was convoluted, [and] it was double- or triple-barrelled."

Ironically DeJong said his "fear from the beginning" was for student safety. He pointed to a "backlash" around the time of a BDS vote in 2009 at York University in Toronto.

"We have a decent amount of students who are both Jewish and Palestinian, [and] I wanted to see if we could handle this in a way without students feeling intimidated or scared on campus," he said.

Windsor police spokesperson Matt D'Asti said the complaint to police "came in as a hate crime [from campus police] and that's the way we're looking at it.

"We take it seriously whenever there's derogatory type comments that are spray-painted like this… and we will investigate it thoroughly."

UWSA president Rob Crawford said he couldn't remember a similar incident on the normally tranquil campus.

"Definitely we've never experienced anything like this. I mean, this is definitely an act that we would condemn strongly," he said.

Crawford said DeJong was a "well-known person on campus" and has "been trying to make sure that [the BDS campaign and vote was] run as fairly as possible."

Crawford was unsure what practical effect the vote would have on the student government. It would not apply to the university as a whole.

"I believe that would be left to interpretation whoever the executives are at that time and how far they want to push that [agenda]," he said.

The question was brought by the campus Palestinian Solidarity Group. Efforts by The CJN to reach the group were unsuccessful.

Josh Zelikovitz, vice-president of the campus Jewish Students Association, said the BDS vote created a "toxic environment" and an "unsafe environment for Jewish students."

Zelikovitz said while no Jewish students have actually been targeted, he said "there's some reason for trouble." He said there has been "increasing rhetoric" through social media with comments such as "people describing supporters of Israel as scum, as child killers, using the kind of language that one might see in lead-up to violence."

The association, which launched a website (www.nobdswindsor.com) during the campaign, was highly critical of the way the question got on the ballot.

"It was effectively rushed through in a way that would minimize debate, minimize dissent," he said. "The campaign period occurred mostly over reading week, [and] the undergraduate society violated its own rules and its own constitution in order to bring this referendum about."

Crawford did not respond to a request for comment about the abuse of process charge.

Meanwhile, following the vote, university president Alan Wildeman said the school will launch an investigation into the process.

IAW organizers condemned

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

With the 10th Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) underway, Jewish groups are condemning the decision by IAW organizers to include messages from two convicted Palestinian terrorists in their programming on Canadian campuses.

The organizers of IAW, an annual series of anti-Israel events held in cities around the world, have chosen to feature Black September airline hijacker Leila Khaled and convicted terrorist Samer Issawi.

On March 6 and 7, IAW organizers will screen a pre-recorded video message by Khaled at a lecture called, "Towards our liberation: Women leading anti-imperialist movements," at Kwantlen Polytechnic University in Surrey, B.C., and at Simon Fraser University in Vancouver, respectively.

As a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Khaled was convicted in Israel for her role in the hijacking of TWA Flight 840 from Rome to Athens in 1969. On March 7, Issawi, who was first convicted by Israel in 2002 for being a member of a terrorist organization – the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine – and for possession of explosives and attempted murder, will appear at an event at the University of Toronto's Mississauga (UTM) campus, either via Skype or pre-recorded video.

In 2011, Issawi was released along with 1,027 Palestinian prisoners as a result of the prisoner exchange for the return of kidnapped Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Shalit. Less than a year later, he was re-arrested for violating the terms of his release by leaving Jerusalem and entering the West Bank.

"Framed under the banner of 'solidarity,' organizers and attendees will clearly be showing solidarity with a convicted terrorist and airline hijacker by presenting them as honoured speakers. The sheer irony that cries for 'justice and peace' will be made by those guilty of endangering and threatening the lives of civilians is apparently lost on the organizers," said Frank Dimant, CEO, B'nai Brith Canada.

Hillel of Greater Toronto's executive director Marc Newburgh expressed his displeasure that a convicted terrorist will be spreading his message to U of T students.

"IAW's glorification of Issawi illustrates the moral bankruptcy of this movement and how out of touch its organizers are with cherished Canadian values. No wonder Canadians have turned their backs on IAW extremism," Newburgh said.

"We call on the university administration to take all necessary steps to prevent UTM from providing a platform for an acknowledged terrorist to address its students and to strictly enforce all campus codes of conduct."

U of T spokesperson Michael Kennedy said the school is aware of the event planned for March 7, during which Issawi will be a featured guest.

"As we do for all events on our campuses, we will balance the need for freedom of expression with the need for the safety and security of students, staff, faculty and visitors," Kennedy said in a statement.

Mobile vet provides services for aging and ill pets

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Palliative and end-of-life home care are growing and accepted parts of modern medicine for people.

But Toronto veterinarian Faith Banks is one of the few in her profession offering mobile palliative and hospice-like care for aging and terminally ill pets.

"Pet owners want to know what to expect as the future unfolds. They want to know they are doing all they can to make their pet comfortable. There is a market for what I do. After providing a pet with a good life, people want to provide them with a good death," Banks said.

Over the years, after working in regular clinics since graduating from the Ontario Veterinary College at the University of Guelph in 1996, Banks became interested in pain control for pets.

As she pursued courses on pain management, her interests further expanded to include geriatrics, rehabilitation, and palliative and hospice care.

"I launched my business – a mobile practice, Midtown Mobile Veterinary Services [MMVS] – just under two years ago. I loved the idea of being a mobile vet, because I was then able to spend more time with each pet and its owner," she said.

Banks visits clients in the comfort and privacy of their homes, with consultations lasting from one to two hours.

"When clients would come into the clinic and discuss different issues that they were experiencing, we would have maybe 15 or 20 minutes together, and I'd see how stressful it was for their pets," Banks recalled.

There are very few veterinarians in Canada offering this kind of hospice service. In veterinary medicine, hospice care is utilized when the pet has several weeks or days to live. Banks' pet loss grief counselling expertise also targets pet owners' psychological well-being.

MMVS serves clients across the GTA. The demand is high. Banks visits six families a week, with fees that she says are only slightly more expensive than a trip to a regular clinic. A new veterinarian, Dr. Karen Stekel, recently joined MMVS.

Forty per cent of Banks' in-home visits provide a quality of life consultation. Her "quality-of-life scale" is made up of 14 different categories, including assessing an animal's appetite, its mobility, and its willingness to give and take love.

New clients receive a geriatric consultation that includes an in-depth conversation covering concerns, fears, needs and goals regarding the condition of a pet that's nearing the end of its life and possible euthanasia.

In-home euthanasia allows the family to say goodbye the way they want in a less stressful and more familiar environment for their pet, she said.

"I have had people Skype in from as far away as Abu Dhabi to participate in the euthanasia. It is a very special ritual. It is all very calm and peaceful," said Banks.

Other services MMVS provides are caregiver support, massage therapy and stretching, nutritional and fluid therapy, pre-euthanasia guidance and preparation, in-home euthanasia and after-care. The only services Banks doesn't provide her patients are surgery and x-rays.

Banks told The CJN about her family's recent loss of their 14-year-old Bernese mountain dog, Smudge.

"I practise what I preach. We had Smudge since she was seven weeks old. I had her on many different types of medications with little mats all over my house to help with mobility. We had a special harness that she used. All the things that I talk to my clients about I was experiencing with my own dog. I applied the quality-of-life scale on her about three different times. Finally, when it was her time, I did the euthanasia myself, outside in the sunshine in the snow, which is where she loved to be, and it was absolutely beautiful."

If desired, Banks will make a clay imprint of an animal's paw and leave it with the family. If the family chooses cremation, she later returns their pet's remains.

Banks is growing the business through veterinarian referrals, word of mouth and social media.

"My rewards are huge. I feel honoured to be able to help people in this way. Sometimes I do it with a lump in my throat, sometimes with tears in my eyes, but always knowing that it is with pure love and kindness that we are ensuring our wonderful fur babies die a good death."

Book may transform the way we view a film

Screenplay: The Foundations of Screenwriting
Syd Field
Delta

Reviewed by Bill Gladstone

As announced in obituaries in Variety, Hollywood Reporter, New York Times and other publications, screenwriting guru Syd Alvin Field died last November in Los Angeles at the age of 77.

It's been 35 years since Field's book Screenplay: The Foundations of Screenwriting was first published in 1979. It sold millions of copies, became known as the "bible" of screenwriting, and established him as a sought-after consultant who gave high-priced seminars to which hopeful novitiates and Hollywood insiders alike would flock.

Field gained seminal experience as a writer-producer and script-reader at a couple of Hollywood production companies. At one company, he read more than 2,000 screenplays in little over two years, recommending only 40 for further development. Only half of these – just one per cent of the total – did he consider worthy of production involving potential investment of millions of dollars.

Field writes that the mountainous size of the slush pile of screenplays never varied, "no matter how fast I read or how many scripts I skimmed, skipped or tossed."

He could synopsize two screenplays a day, but when he got to the third, "the words, characters and actions all seemed to congeal into some kind of amorphous goo of plotlines concerning the FBI and CIA, punctuated with bank heists, murders and car chases, with a lot of wet kisses and naked flesh thrown in for local colour."

This passage reminded me of my decades-long involvement as a freelance reader for a major Toronto-based commercial publisher. A huge pyramid of unsolicited action-adventure manuscripts towered behind my boss's desk. Each time I visited, he gave me a stack of them; I was paid $75 to $100 to read and write a two-page synopsis of each. Over time, I learned to skim through the pages, seeking out what Field would call the essential "plot points" that help shape and define the narrative, dividing the ever-present sections that Field, like Aristotle, labelled Beginning, Middle and End.

Field gave immense thought to why he gave the thumbs-down to most scripts and what distinguished the precious few that won his approval. "What I was looking for, I soon realized, was a style that exploded off the page, exhibiting the kind of raw energy found in scripts like Chinatown, Taxi Driver, The Godfather and American Graffiti."

But of course there was much more to it than that. Ultimately he looked beyond content to structure, finding the essential "plot points" that exist, or should exist, in all narrative films, no matter the story, setting, characters or genre.

Most films run 90 to 120 minutes on average, Field reasoned, and a script should average about one page per minute of screen time. In a 120-page script, the beginning section, Act 1, will be about 30 pages long. This is where the screenwriter sets up the story, establishes the characters, illustrates the situation surrounding the action and launches the movie's dramatic premise.

Act 2, approximately 60 pages long, is where the main character deals with the challenge earlier established, confronting a series of obstacles in pursuit of his or her dramatic goals. Act 3, filling the remaining 30 pages or so, delivers the resolution to the story. Field's reductionist paradigm, "Set-Up, Confrontation, Resolution," along with the plot-points separating these sections, should be recognizable in all movies, he writes. When a set-up is weak, viewers lose interest, though they may not know why. When a film lacks a clear resolution, viewers will be disappointed, saying the plot went wrong or became confused.

I must acknowledge that Field transformed the way I view films. Usually when I watch a film, I try to identify two key plot-points – the "handshake" moment at the end of Act 1 when the dramatic challenge is defined, often with a handshake or vow, and the grand "reversal" at the end of Act 2 that sets the stage for the resolution. Who dared say, before Field came along, that all movies were essentially the same in structure?

"Syd was the pioneer of the study of the screenwriting form," screenwriter John Truby told the New York Times. "He was the first to challenge the old romantic notion that writing a good script was a gift of divine intervention, and instead showed that it comes from a craft that can be learned."

Screenplay: The Foundations of Screenwriting is the most popular of Field's handful of books on the subject. When I first read it many years ago, I felt I had found the cinematic equivalent to The Anatomy of Criticism, Northrup Frye's brilliant and unsurpassed classic of literary criticism.

Revised and updated numerous times, Screenplay stands up well to a second reading, and its insights still seem exciting, but the movies cited as examples – such as The Godfather, Chinatown and Witness – seem dated and limited. Field is certainly not in the same league as Frye, but novice scriptwriters are nonetheless well advised to consider his cinematic paradigm as a sort of "great code" of the movies.

Correspondences
Poetry by Anne Michaels and Portraits by Bernice Eisenstein
McClelland & Stewart/Random House

Here's something you probably never knew about Joyce Kilmer, author of the famous poem Trees ("I think that I shall never see/ A poem as lovely as a tree"). Turns out that despite the first name, Kilmer was a man – an American from New Jersey who died tragically young, age 31, in World War I.

Correspondences is an "accordion book" featuring the poetry of Anne Michaels (author of the award-winning novel Fugitive Pieces) on one side and colour portraits by Bernice Eisenstein (author of the graphic novel I Was A Child of Holocaust Survivors) on the other. Their shared subjects are a gallery of notable 20th-century writers and thinkers – Camus, Celan, Einstein, Kafka, Levi, Mandelstam, Manger, Schultz, Schwartz-Bart, Sebald and others – many of whom trod around or into the fateful terrain of war and the Holocaust that is so familiar to both contributors.

While Eisenstein's portraits are a delight and instantly accessible, Michaels' poems seem aloof, unable to make friends easily. The stated purpose of this avant-garde book is to engage the reader in the correspondences and spaces between the former's beguiling bust portraits and the latter's much more demanding observations and pontifications, seemingly so deep at times as to be obscure.

A different take on a mother-daughter relationship

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Leah Cherniak

Toronto's Leah Cherniak directs Factory Theatre's latest offering, the world premiere of 6 Essential Questions, Canadian poet, novelist and academic Priscila Uppal's first play.

Based on Uppal's 2013 critically acclaimed memoir Projection: Encounters with My Runaway Mother, the play 6 Essential Questions tells the tale of Renata as she travels to Brazil to see the mother who abandoned her when she was five years old. In fact, the character of Renata is based on Uppal herself.

"The play is a spiritual recounting of a young woman's [trip] to Brazil to visit her mother, whom she hasn't seen in 20 years. Her mother ran away from their home in Canada and there was no contact between them. It's a play that looks at what happens when family memory is repressed," the multi-award winning director said.

Cherniak said she was drawn to the play because of its poetic language. "The play has the quality of a dream, it's like Alice in Wonderland, where the daughter falls from somewhere and ends up in this strange country, which is Brazil, where she meets her mother and parts of the family, and how they respond to her."

Much as she appreciates the poetic tone, she said, "there are challenges in directing this because it's not your basic psychological realism, those sorts of plays you can work out in a specific kind of theatrical structure. It has much more poetic licence and dream language in it. It's always challenging, but that is also what's exciting about it because the world is rich, quite beautiful and funny. For me, it is a wonderful story... the story of a woman discovering something about herself and her family and [finally] giving herself... the freedom to move on."

But despite the poetic quality of the play, Cherniak said 6 Essential Questions does not idealize mother-daughter relationships.

"We are actually saying that are we operating under a learned and habitual experience of how mothers and daughters behave and what happens if you don't have a mother," Cherniak said. "And what does it mean to be motherless, and can you get beyond that? I think this play says, yes you can, and that we shouldn't assume that just because you don't have a mother, your life has any less forward drive than if you had a mother."

The cast consists of Mina James as Renata, Elizabeth Saunders as her mother and Maggie Huculak as the grandmother. Richard Zeppieri takes the role of Renata's uncle. All of them have thrown themselves into the style of the play, grappling successfully with the issues and the language.

Cherniak said the actors have also tapped into their comedic side and captured the very funny moments in the primarily serious piece.

Having started her theatre career as an actor, Cherniak feels she comes to directing with an actor's' perspective. She was co-founder, along with Martha Ross, of Theatre Columbus, which has created more than 30 new plays and can boast about its innovative productions of classics. She directed many of the plays in the Theatre Columbus repertoire, including The Anger in Ernest and Ernestine, Gynty, Twelfth Night, The Betrayal, Hotel Loopy, And Up They Flew and Dance of the Red Skirts.

She is also an associate artist and associate director with The Academy at Soulpepper Theatre Company and has many other directing credits. In addition, she teaches in the Ryerson Theatre Program and at the University of Toronto.

Cherniak who is a mother herself, to daughter Margaret Rose, 16, credits her family for her love of the arts, although she is the only one in her family to have pursued a career in the field. When not directing, she enjoys films, reading and dinners with friends and family.

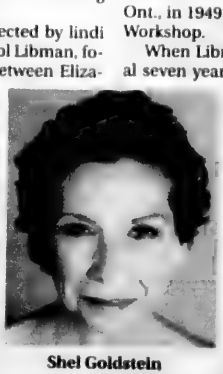
For tickets to 6 Essential Questions at the Factory Theatre, March 1 to 30, call 416-504-9971 or go to www.factorytheatre.ca.

Play builds on 'connections' between people

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A play about the ways in which the lives of six people are affected by love, loss and memory debuts this week at the Sterling Studio Theatre in Toronto.

A Life Beyond Doubt, directed by lindi g. papoff and written by Carol Libman, focuses on the relationship between Elizabeth, a 30-something divorcee coping with the recent death of her mother, and Tom, a widower in his late 40s and a father to two teenaged boys, who is hesitant to let Elizabeth in.



Shel Goldstein

Libman, a Montreal native who began her writing career as a sports reporter for the Montreal Gazette, explained that A Life Beyond Doubt evolved from a one-act play she wrote called Connections.

"It started out with one scene – a mother-daughter scene... At the time, the play was called Connections because of the way they were connected. As I keep saying, everyone wanted to know what was going to happen next, including me. The characters didn't want to leave the stage, and I had to continue, so I started writing more scenes, dialogue," said Libman, 85, who has been involved in theatre since she moved to Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., in 1949 and joined the Sault Theatre Workshop.

When Libman moved back to Montreal seven years later, she helped establish the Playwrights Workshop Montreal, which just celebrated its 50th anniversary.

Libman, who now lives in Toronto, is an active member of the New Play Development Group of the Alumnae Theatre. She said her latest project, A Life Beyond Doubt, is about history, memory and relationships.

"It involves how memory affects you, and if you don't have memory about something, you have no idea. But if you do have memories of something similar, how do you react? How do you absorb that and go forward? We ask a lot of questions," she said.

"One of the main characters, Elizabeth, who is the daughter, meets a man who is a widower with two boys and they become involved, and then there are questions because they have baggage."

Libman said a major theme in the play is "the way people carry memories but manage to find ways of coping and moving on because otherwise you're paralyzed. You have to move forward, no matter what happens to you. What choice do you have?"

Shel Goldstein, who plays the role of Marge, a woman in her early 70s who was a close family friend of Tom's late wife, said that when she thinks about what the play is about, "loss is the word that keeps coming up – different ways of how people in their lives lose what is most beloved to them and different ways of dealing with that, or coping."

Although the play centres on the dynamic between Elizabeth and Tom, another interesting relationship develops between Marge and Tom's 14-year-old son, Kevin.

"He tells her things that he doesn't tell other people. She's not closely related, but she's available, so that is an unusual relationship on stage for a non-relative – she's not his grandmother – and it sort of fills a void for her, too," Goldstein said.

Beyond creating deep relationships between the characters, Goldstein said Libman also succeeded in writing realistic, relatable dialogue.

"Carol has this wonderful facility of dialogue and humour, and I think what I love most about her writing is the nuance of capturing an argument, of how someone will say something but it's not quite heard, and then they build on their misunderstanding," she said.

"In my life experience, we get caught up in the heat of the moment and we miss the point, and if that can be repaired, that's great, but sometimes those things can't be repaired."

Although the writer, director and two of the actors are Jewish, this isn't a Jewish story.

"But it's a story about people, relationships, loss, which is a universal, common experience... It's entertaining and touching," Goldstein said.

The play, presented by Tomorrow's Eve Theatre, runs from March 6 to15 at the Sterling Studio Theatre. For more information, visit www.tomorrowsevetheatre.org or call 1-800-838-3006, ext 1.

Solo or with others, singer shares love of music

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Singer Janis Siegel can't be categorized by her music or the people she sings with. Her repertoire includes Broadway, jazz, rhythm and blues, swing and other genres, both as a solo performer and as a member of the four-part jazz group The Manhattan Transfer.

Siegel will showcase her vocal talents with The Manhattan Transfer at Koerner Hall in Toronto on March 8 in a Royal Conservatory of Music concert. She also may sing a solo from her latest CD, Night Songs, a collection of Caribbean and Latin-flavoured songs.

Siegel is the rare singer to have dual careers – singing for 41 years with The Manhattan Transfer while also performing solo for 32 years and never leaving the group for her solo career.

"I love all aspects of music. I never want to stop the individual style of singing solo, and yet, at the same time, I always enjoyed the beauty of singing in harmony," the 61-year-old Siegel said in a phone conversation from her home in New York.

The Manhattan Transfer's original four members, including Siegel, have endured longer than The Beatles, The Four Seasons and most other vocal groups.

"All four of us care and have both professional and personal friendships that have endured for decades," Siegel said. "We instinctively know how to harmonize and which songs fit best for each singer in the group. It is a blessing for me to have been with The Manhattan Transfer for most of my life."

Born and raised in Brooklyn, Siegel started singing at age 12 with the group The Young Generation, and released two singles on record while still a teen. She had no intention of making singing a career, studying nursing in college, but a chance meeting with Tim Hauser, who was to create The Manhattan Transfer with Siegel and two other singers, led her to a new path.

"I loved singing, and the thought of doing it full time for a kid who loved Motown, Beatles, jazz and Streisand was too enticing to resist. I never had any regrets for choosing singing as my career."

Over her career, Siegel has earned nine Grammy Awards and 17 nominations for her music, both with The Manhattan Transfer and as a solo performer. Her strong vocals led to songs such as Operator, Chanson D'Amour and Route 66 becoming hits for The Manhattan Transfer.

Less well-known are Siegel's strong Jewish roots and love of Judaism, especially because she has been romantically involved with Rabbi Harry Levin for several years.

"Harry has made me appreciate his deep connection and love for Judaism that inspires me and [makes me] wish to share the more meaningful values and ethics of our religion."

Siegel has used her vocal talents to express her joy at being Jewish. In the 1993 film Swing Boys, set in Nazi Germany, she gave a stirring emotional interpretation of the famed Yiddish song Bei Mir Bist Du Schein.

She also teamed with Jewish vocal partner Alan Paul of The Manhattan Transfer in the 2008 CD Jewish Songbook, singing vocal harmony in the song Ut A Zoi.

The Manhattan Transfer has performed in Israel many times and will perform there again in May.

"I especially enjoyed my first trip, taking my parents to see me perform there, and it was thrilling," Siegel said.

Siegel performs with The Manhattan Transfer March 8, 8 p.m., at Koerner Hall, 273 Bloor St. W. in downtown Toronto. For tickets, call 416-408-0208 or go to www.rcmusic.ca.

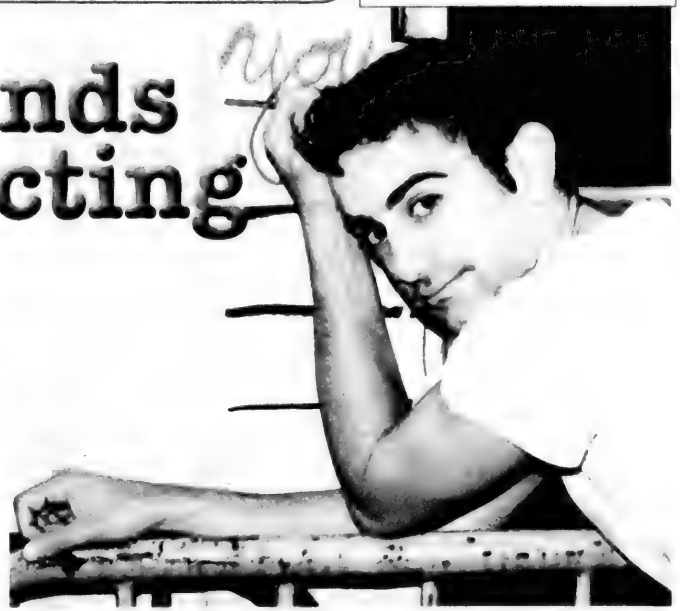
Comedian blends improv and acting



Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

An improv comedian is someone who thinks on the spot and isn't afraid to take chances. That describes Alan Kliffer in a nutshell.

Through his production company Kliffer Entertainment, the Winnipeg-born, Toronto-based actor, director and writer produces live shows featuring some of the biggest names in Canadian comedy. We're talking Colin Mochrie, Linda Kash, and Kathy Greenwood, among many others.

What's even more impressive is that the 28-year-old Second City alum launched his company less than a year ago. However, he's no overnight success. He's been acting since the age of five, when his parents enrolled him in a class at the Manitoba Theatre for Young People.

While performing his first monologue in that acting class, Kliffer noticed the audience started laughing hard. That's when he realized the power of acting.

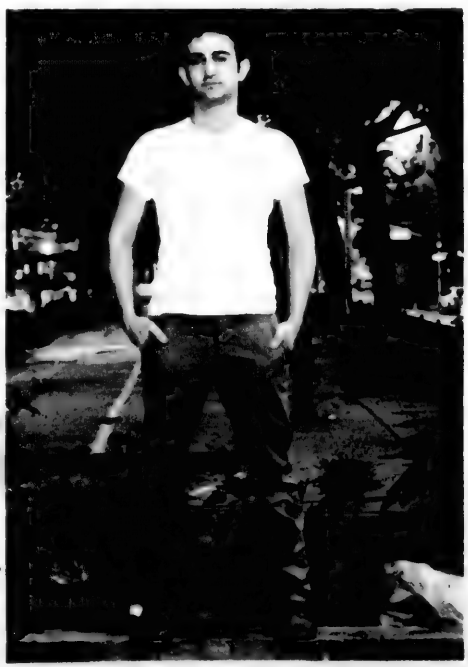
"I went to my parents when I was five years old and I said, 'When I'm 18, I'm moving to Toronto and I'm becoming an actor,'" he told The CJN.

Kliffer did just that. But first, he found another love: improv. The young performer and Camp Massad alum began taking improv classes at the age of 14. He started competing in the High School Canadian Improv Games shortly afterward under the direction of Second City's Scott Montgomery.

He attributes part of his passion for improv to a babysitter who let him watch sketch comedy as a kid.

"[She] let me sneak it when I was young," he says, adding that he was watching Saturday Night Live even before he could understand the comedy.

Kliffer has never been afraid to make opportunities for himself. Early on, a Winnipeg sketch comedy troupe turned him down. Instead of giving up, he rallied his friends to form his own group and produced his first show at the age of 15.



He moved to Toronto in the early 2000s to study acting at the Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts. The Winnipeg native is the first to admit he's had his fair share of ups and downs, but he's always been able to bounce right back.

"I got held back my first term – I had to repeat it," he says, revealing that he used to talk back to teachers and get to class late. "After I repeated my first term, I actually got kicked out of the school. I'm the only person in their 21-year history to have gone right back into the program and finished it and won an award."

Not only that, Kliffer also founded the school's improv club. He was recently invited back to Randolph – this time as an instructor – and today he teaches improv to first- and second-year students, many of whom seek his advice and mentorship.

After graduating from Randolph in 2006, he joined the prestigious improv conservatory program at Second City. Once he completed it, Kliffer was invited to work for the organization that launched the careers of comedians such as Eugene Levy and Tina Fey. Starting off as the camp director, he eventually became the training and education co-ordinator before moving on to the position of youth program director.

After two years of working for Second City, the comedy institution gave him two options: he could either go his own way and pursue acting, or stay in the organization in a strictly administrative role. It was a tough call, but he chose to go after his acting dream and become his own boss. It turned out to be the best decision he ever made.

Kliffer decided to use his savings from a corporate gig with the Discovery Channel to move to New York for the summer. While in the Big Apple, he spent a lot of time at the Upright Citizens Brigade, where he was introduced to a show that really piqued his interest.

Kliffer got the rights, tweaked it a bit and Mixed Company was born a few months later.

The show, which takes place every month at Toronto's Comedy Bar, pairs actors with improv comedians, and the result is pure comedy gold. The actors are scripted, but their improv scene partners have no idea what's coming next and are forced to do what they do best: think on the spot and improvise the entire scene.

The show is often performed to sold-out crowds, and the calibre of performers is quite impressive. The cast rotates each time, but on any given night audiences can expect to see stars from Degrassi, Rookie Blue and Whose Line is it Anyway?, among other shows. What's even more impressive: the actors are willing to participate for free, a testament to Kliffer's hard work and dedication.

A one-man company, Kliffer adds his personal touch to everything. The energetic producer makes sure his cast is always taken care of, edits the pre-show advertisements himself and sometimes stays up until 5 a.m. baking food to sell at the concession stand for his productions.

Kliffer says he hopes to continue growing his projects, which also include a web series (First Dates). One day, he also hopes to launch an improv acting studio in Toronto.

At the end of the day, he loves what he does and can't imagine doing anything else.

"We as actors and as artists get to make people feel something," he says.

"That's pretty huge. Yeah, doctors save lives. We make people laugh and cry. We evoke emotions in other people. That is an unbelievable thing."

Young professionals mingle with mentors

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Philanthropy and networking were again the focus of the fourth annual Revolving Tables, which this year raised $130,000 for the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF).

More than 250 young professionals, along with almost 40 high-profile executives and community leaders, gathered Feb. 19 at the Four Seasons Hotel for an interactive and informative three-course dinner.

The executives in attendance included Jordan Banks, managing director of Facebook Canada; Len Cochrane, president of Teletoon; Paul Godfrey, president and CEO of Postmedia Network Inc.; and Janice Fukakusa, chief administrative officer and chief financial officer of RBC.

Organized by a committee of people who are mostly under the age of 30, the event demonstrated how young professionals can get involved in fundraising while creating a productive and valuable experience for their peers.

During the meal, the young adults had a unique opportunity to rotate from table to table and speak with professional mentors, trendsetters and leaders in their fields.

"I think [Revolving Tables] is so important because it allows young professionals to build their skill sets and network with other like-minded individuals," said Laura Licht, event co-chair with Jeff Kimel. "This event is particularly rewarding for them, as they are very selective of where they spend their dollars and they want to give back in a way that's meaningful to them.

"This event really helps them build their visibility and get connected with some of the most high-profile executives in Canada, while, at the same time, giving back to their community."

Licht, who also volunteers for Big Brothers Big Sisters of Canada, said she first got involved with Revolving Tables two years ago. "I attended the event as a participant and was on the organizing committee last year. I loved the event and was ecstatic when I was asked to chair it."

She said she originally got involved when her mother was diagnosed with cancer. "The more I shared my experience, the more I realized cancer really touches everyone and I wanted to be a part of helping to find a cure. I also believe in the importance of getting young professionals involved in not-for-profit work and in fostering young leadership."

Kimel said he thinks Revolving Tables is a particularly important event because the ICRF accomplishes two goals in one night: mentorship and networking, as well as fundraising. He encourages other young professionals to get involved with similar community initiatives, as "it's one of the greatest decisions anyone can make."

Kimel said he was fortunate to grow up in a household where his parents led by example and demonstrated the importance of becoming involved in the community.

"Everyone I have spoken with who has taken on significant leadership roles within the community has told me that you get way more out of giving and getting involved in the community than anything else," he said. "I would suggest starting anywhere – reach out to any philanthropic organization you feel a connection with and join a committee or help brainstorm new ideas. The opportunities in the community are really endless."

ICRF executive director Joy Wagner Arbus said Revolving Tables has been "an overwhelming success" with young adults. "The volunteers and participants are contributing toward supporting critical cancer research in Israel. The 'next generation' continues to be an inspiration. Their keen interest in giving back to Israel and to such an important cancer cause is truly amazing. We look forward to watching them grow into their professional careers while supporting superior research that is extending lives of cancer patients, both now and in the future."

Starting from scratch

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

"How can you write that?" My husband has just read one of my Married With Kids columns and is vetting it. Big time.

"It's too personal," he says earnestly. "You're going to get into trouble, and I'm going to say, 'I told you so!'"

One story I wrote a couple of years ago got me into so much trouble, we still referred to it as "the incident." I thought I'd written piercingly on an important issue, at the time. Turns out, others did not agree – my spouse, in particular. In fairness, he'd warned me that the column was dangerous, but my ears were deaf to his cautions, and my sensibilities dulled about the potential marital backlash.

When he reads today's column, he asks me one question: "Didn't you learn your lesson the last time?" The lesson he's referring to is "the incident," of course. I gulp and make a new plan.

It's not easy being the family member of a journalist, particularly when you never know which aspect of your life will become fodder for the next column. I'm constantly trolling through my experiences for stories, looking for anecdotes that readers can hopefully relate to in the realm of marriage and children. What's off limits? I'm still trying to figure that out, one month at a time.

My spouse has been extraordinarily good-natured about his presence in my columns, showing graceful tolerance when I give readers a glimpse of our inner life together. Whether it's his iPod addiction or his strewn clothes under discussion, he takes it in stride. But every now and then, he puts his foot down. Tonight was one of those times, and it meant a column about one of our kids' friends was about to bite the dust, even though I believed every word of it to be true. My daughter, spying her name on the computer monitor, insisted on reading it too, and agreed.

"You can't do this to me, Mom," she declared. "If my friends or their parents ever read this, the friendship is over."

I sighed. I was on deadline and couldn't afford another "holy cow," a subject that was utterly taboo. The one under discussion in particular was a meaty one that I felt sure readers would be able to identify with.

"I could change the names," I tried.

But I was surrounded on all sides. Vetoed. The column was destined to join a few others in my folder that had been deemed too dangerous – potential friendship killers, whether they were true or not.

I know a bit about "holy cows." There are some subjects too tender to make their way into my columns and some relationships I've forbidden myself to delve into in this public space. My fear is that I'll fracture the delicate shells of those relationships or create waves of long-term unpleasantness I don't even want to imagine. Still, when I'm reaching for new ideas, it's these that beckon. Money, and how its change of hands impacts the family. Friendships, and their deeper politics. Parents-in-law, and the complicated yet inexorable ties that bind us all together in a sometimes uncomfortable family embrace.

Writing about marriage and kids is stressful when I get vetoed, but it's also deeply cathartic. It offers a space, both in my mind and on the blank page, where I can explore an issue in my home, turn it this way and that, and sometimes gain a deeper understanding or perspective on that issue.

But there are always others involved when you are married with kids, and when it's their business that you're discussing, you have to be careful.

When I'm skirting close to the limit in my columns, I ask my husband to read them first, even though I know precisely what his response will be. I argue my case, he counters with his, and then I swallow hard and sometimes start again from scratch.

MEZUZAH HUNG: Rabbi Yirmi Cohen of Ohalei Yoseph Yitzchak Congregation and newly elected Thornhill MPP Gila Martow put up a mezuzah at her new Queen's Park office Feb. 24. Martow is the only Jewish MPP in the Conservative caucus. Among those attending the ceremony were former Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis and local school trustee Joel Hertz.

Purim – the holiday for the kids

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Purim is a holiday where we celebrate by poking fun at ourselves. We throw all decorum away for the day. It is said that Purim is a time for silliness and humour.

The Purim holiday is also the time when children can go all out and participate in their favourite activities. Kids can dress up, play games, run around and make tons of noise and get away with it.

Our holidays are always known for great food, and Purim is no exception. Kids can gobble up oodles of traditional treats. It's known for its delicious hamantashen, the official Purim treat, the traditionally shaped triangular pastries that resemble Haman's pockets, ears or three-cornered hat, that are filled with sweet or savoury fillings.

Wicked Haman was the man who terrorized and plotted to exterminate the Jews in ancient Persia. He is the villain of the Purim story or Megillah that's read each Purim. Although most details in the real story of Purim should not be discussed with young children, they quickly learn to recognize a major detail – shaking their greggers or noisemakers at the mention of Haman's name is an important tradition.

Children should be taught to understand that in an era when we are still fighting against anti-Semitism, Purim is a time to celebrate that we have beaten anti-Semitism in our history. So this Purim, encourage your children or grandchildren to have fun and enjoy these scrumptious and amusing hamantashen along with every other entertaining and pleasurable aspect of Purim.

ADORABLE HAMANTASHEN WITH CHERRY FILLING

1/2 cup canola oil
3/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. pure almond extract
2 large eggs
1 tbsp. water
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/8 tsp. salt
1 can cherry pie filling

In food processor or in a mixing bowl, combine oil, sugar, almond extract, eggs and water. Add in flour, baking powder and salt just until blended.

Preheat oven to 350. Line cookie sheets with parchment paper. On a floured board, roll out dough to 1/4-in. thick, and with a glass or cookie cutter, cut dough into 3-inch circles. Spoon 1 teaspoon of cherry pie filling into the centre of each circle. Pinch edges tightly to form three corners. A small amount of the filling should peek out. Bake for 12-15 minutes, until golden brown. Place cookie sheets on wire racks until cool.

Puppet Eyes
2-4 tbsp. white chocolate
M&M's chocolate candies
2 tbsp. semi-sweet chocolate

Place some parchment paper on a flat tray. Melt the white chocolate in a small glass dish for about 20-30 seconds in the microwave. Mix chocolate with a fork until smooth. Dip the flat end of a wooden spoon into the white chocolate and make a small circle on the parchment paper. This will be the white of the eye.

Add one M&M to the centre of each circle. Continue making white chocolate dots and placing M&M's until you have enough for a pair of eyes for each hamantash. Place tray in the fridge for 10-20 minutes to cool and harden. Melt semi-sweet chocolate, and using the end of a smaller spoon, dip into the chocolate and make a dot in the middle of each M&M.

Remelt the remainder of the white chocolate, and with a toothpick, dip into the chocolate and make a small white dot on one side of the dark chocolate to look like a reflection of light. Cool in fridge once again. Carefully remove the "eyes" from the parchment paper. Glue the eyes to the hamantashen with another dot of melted white chocolate.

M&M's HAMANTASHEN WITH CHOCOLATE FILLING

Pastry
1/2 cup canola oil
3/4 cup sugar
1 tsp pure vanilla
2 large eggs
1 tbsp. water
1 tsp. orange zest
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/8 tsp. salt
1 cup M&M's chocolate candies
Chocolate Filling
1 cup chocolate chips
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1/3 cup sugar
1 egg, beaten
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract

In food processor or in a mixing bowl, combine oil, sugar, vanilla, eggs and water. Add in orange zest. Add in flour, baking powder and salt just until blended. Add in M&M's by hand.

For filling, melt chocolate and margarine in a covered Pyrex or microwave safe bowl for 60 seconds. Cool. Combine in sugar, egg and vanilla.

Preheat oven to 350. Line cookie sheets with parchment paper. On a floured board, roll out dough to 1/4-in. thick, careful not to crush the M&M's. With a glass or cookie cutter, cut dough into 3-in. circles.

Spoon 1 tsp. of chocolate filling into centre of each circle of dough. Pinch edges tightly to form three corners. A small amount of the filling should peek out. Bake for 12-15 minutes, until golden brown. Place cookie sheets on wire racks until cool.

Welcome Home Addiction Recovery Academy

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Back in 1999, when John Volken began looking for a destination for his intended charitable donations, he wanted to be strategic.

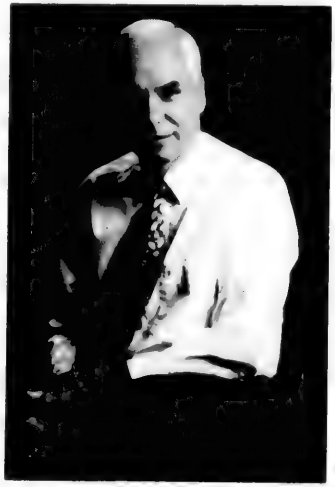
Volken, who owned United Furniture at that time, met with members of the Union Gospel Mission and the Salvation Army to find out where his help was most needed. In the process, he learned that many individuals with addiction went through up to 10 detoxification programs before they were even 30 years old.

"We need a long-term residential recovery venue so former addicts can learn life and work skills," he was told.

Volken determined he would create one, and dedicated over $100 million to make it happen. In 2003 he opened the Welcome Home Addiction Recovery Academy in Surrey, B.C.

It started with a duplex, grew to include four homes in the neighbourhood of Newton, and is set to expand once again when a 100-bed facility opens in Surrey at the end of 2014.

The not-for-profit residential addiction recovery program serves men and women from across Canada, between the ages of 19 and 34. What distinguishes the program is its length: a full two years. Residents spend their days working in one of Volken's stores to learn work skills, and have 'Encounter Sessions' each week where they're coached by their peers on behaviour that needs improvement. In addition there's a host of opportunities for them to learn useful life and work skills.



John Volken

"The two year commitment is the biggest hurdle for recovering drug addicts," says Bil Kooner, director of the academy.

Kooner gets residents to interview other, potential residents and advise on who is suitable.

"They figure out on our behalf if new applicants need detox first, or if they're just looking for a warm bed, or if they have any real commitment to recovery," he explains.

Once accepted, applicants or their families are required to pay a one-time fee and the rest is taken care of by the John Volken Foundation. In this abstinence-based program, residents start off with limited freedoms and earn their freedoms back over time. Those freedoms include more visitors, phone calls and specified hours away from the residence.

But they're kept busy at the academy. The days begin at 6 a.m., with morning motivational meetings, shifts at the retail store, encounter sessions, yoga, gym time, instruction in writing skills, swimming, basketball and computer classes. Kooner says the new facility, which will be on King George and 68th avenues, will include a gym and exercise rooms, computer labs, a library and a banquet hall. It will more than triple the academy's capacity when it opens.

The success stories over the last decade have been many. "We have one guy who was a prolific car thief with a drug habit and who is now an aluminum welder," Kooner says. "Another guy is in university and another former resident is getting his mechanics tickets. They're not all going to be superstars, but they're doing jobs and feeding themselves."

Part of the graduation project at the academy is finding a job or pursuing further education. Residents can live in the Alumni House until they've saved enough money to move out. "We want to see where they'll be living and working, to ensure it's not an atmosphere conducive to falling back into old habits," he explains. "Anyway, the residences they're staying in with us are nicely furnished million-dollar homes, so residents don't usually want to move down when they leave here."

For applicants outside of Vancouver, interviews can occur by telephone. For more information on the Academy visit whrecovery.org.

New oncology spa & boutique coming to Toronto

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

When Compassionate Beauty opens in Toronto this spring, the oncology boutique and spa is going to make a big difference for women living with cancer. It will be the first retail site people will encounter as they leave Sunnybrook's Odette Cancer Centre.

"For me, this is a huge location," says Saundra Shapiro, a Calgary resident who founded the company in Calgary in 2005.

"Toronto is just a whole different market. I really think that given the location, people and the population being funnelled through Toronto, it's huge."

Shapiro is an entrepreneur dedicated to providing a unique centre for women undergoing cancer treatment. Her spa and boutique offers mastectomy fitting, wig fitting, an esthetician, a cosmetician, a massage therapist and tattooing services. The store also offers swimwear, yoga wear, lingerie, sports clothes and other apparel for women with cancer.

"For women in treatment, their immune system is compromised so they can't have a regular spa treatment – but they still want it," Shapiro says. "We found ways and products to ensure their safety and still give them the services they're used to getting."

Saundra Shapiro

Shapiro's staff is specially trained to deal with women undergoing cancer treatment. The massage therapists, for example, are trained with manual lymphatic drainage, which is important for a woman who has had surgery involving lymph nodes.

Shapiro has locations in Calgary, Vancouver and Phoenix, with impending openings in Edmonton and Toronto. A Montreal native, she moved to Alberta in 1982. When she learned that her best friend Louise, from childhood, was diagnosed with recurrent cervical cancer, the two friends spent a year brainstorming about the things women would want at a store like Compassionate Beauty.

"One day in particular, Louise just wanted a facial but she wasn't comfortable taking off her wig and laying on the esthetics bed," she recalls.

"She wanted to feel safe and accepted and have a sense of belonging, instead of standing out because of her visible effects of chemotherapy. Compassionate Beauty now has a facial room and happily loves every woman that has a treatment, with hair or without."

After Louise lost her battle with cancer, Shapiro was determined to open the store, and the response has been tremendous. "From our first year we've quadrupled the number of women coming in," she says. "We've seen over 11,000 women – pretty scary numbers, and now we have doctors, surgeons, oncologists and cancer hospitals behind us, referring patients to us."

It turns out, her own mother is one of her best clients. "When we first opened, my mother, who had never had cancer, used to spend days with me at the store. She never understood why I would want to open a store like Compassionate Beauty," Shapiro says. "A year later she was diagnosed with lung cancer, and one year after that was cured, she was diagnosed with lymphoma, then breast cancer, and now her lymphoma has returned."

Shapiro is all ready looking forward to the day she can go out of business. "Our slogan is, 'unfortunately, we're open,'" she says.

"We're sad to be here because cancer is so prevalent, but there needs to be a store here for all these women. We're humbled to help them through a really scary time in their lives. The day cancer is eradicated I'm going to close the store and sell it to a spa or salon with a big smile on my face, because there's nothing worse than being diagnosed with cancer. The effect it has on family, friends and yourself, you can't compare it to anything else."

Runners unite to raise funds for Israel's Shalva centres

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Marathons can be rewarding and life changing. Toronto friends Samantha Diamond and Arlene Rosenberg will be running more than a race at the fourth annual Jerusalem International Marathon on March 21. They are running to raise funds and awareness for a charity in which they believe: Israel's Shalva centres.

Shalva's mission is to provide respite, care, innovative programming, and critically needed therapies to hundreds of children with special needs, as well as to their families, 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. All of Shalva's services are provided completely free of charge.

"As a Jew, I thought, what a dream come true. I am a runner. I love physical activity and a challenge. Compared to the challenge that these kids have, running on the hills and the cobblestones in Jerusalem will be no challenge at all," said Rosenberg, grandmother of six.

Israel's Team Shalva will gather some 400-plus runners, and 180 international participants are expected to travel from London, Mexico, Canada and the United States to run with the group from Israel.

No strangers to running, Diamond and Rosenberg have been hitting the pavement for years. Rosenberg is fresh off the heels of the New York Marathon, and Diamond, who has run several half-marathons, will be competing in her first full marathon in a race setting.

Training consists of a 16-week program from the Running Room designed to build speed and stamina. It includes gradual hill training, together with circuit training focusing on sprints, tempo run, and long runs building up to 23 miles, with easier runs ranging from 8 to 15 miles. Every Saturday is a designated rest day.

Diamond, a mother of two young children, said, "Not only do I get to be in Israel, our homeland, but I also have the chance to meet the educators and the children of this incredible organization. I feel as though I am making a difference by the funds I am raising."

Having volunteered with special needs children in the past, she added, "when I was younger, I did volunteer work at Zareinu Education Centre."

Rosenberg said, "My passion has always been helping kids. I used to volunteer with Starlight's Children Foundation."

Israeli soldier, Gilad Shalit, a spokesperson and volunteer with Shalva, will be running with Team Shalva and participating in the weekend programming, which includes speakers, a victory party after the marathon, and a Shabbat dinner.

Shalva was founded in May 1990 by Kalman and Malki Samuels. Their own experience with the challenge of raising a child with special needs, coupled with a strong desire to help families in similar situations, was the inspiration behind its creation.

The Hebrew letters shin, lamed, vav, and heh, comprising the name Shalva, stand for shichrur l'mishpacha v'layeled hamugbal: "liberating the child with special needs and their family." In Hebrew, the word shalva means "peace of mind."

From humble beginnings, today Shalva has become a leader in the field of disability awareness and intervention in the Middle East.

Tania Cohen, director of Shalva, said, "this year, the marathon Team Shalva is expected to raise upwards of half a million dollars. The money raised from the Team Shalva effort supports both Shalva centres, located in Jerusalem and Alon Shvut. Runners who raise a minimum of $3,600 will have corporate sponsors underwriting the cost of their round-trip airfare and three nights' hotel accommodation."

American olim create spiritual approach to dealing with illness

Judy Lash Balint
JNS.org

Israelis have a reputation for being frank and direct – dugri, in local parlance. But when it comes to death and dying or dealing with chronic illness, many Israelis have as much trouble dealing with it as people in any other part of the world.

For the past decade Life's Door -Tishkofet, a non-profit organization founded by Dr. Ben and Dvora Corn, American immigrants to Israel, has been helping Israelis understand that illness and loss are part of the continuum of life, and teaching professionals as well as patients how to transform anguish, confusion, and denial into hope and personal growth.

The Corns made aliyah in 1997 with their four daughters and realized that they could make a meaningful contribution by bringing the concept of spiritual care to Israeli society. Tishkofet's activities today encompass a broad array of programs in seven communities throughout Israel. The programs include training workshops for hundreds of medical professionals and volunteers in the art of emotional and spiritual support for people with chronic or terminal illness, as well as individual therapy for thousands of patients and their loved ones.

Support groups and retreats with an emphasis on taking control and finding the spiritual strength to confront illness are all part of how Tishkofet leaders hope to change society's view of illness.

"The natural inclination of most people faced with serious illness is denial," says Tishkofet co-founder and executive director Dvora Corn, a U.S.-trained occupational and family therapist. "Israelis love to say: 'Yehiye b'seder' (It'll be OK). We've built barriers to what's a natural part of human existence," she asserts.

Corn believes that once people confronted with illness are provided a structure to explore how to make choices of where to spend time and how to invest in their life, they can grow and cope.

"Illness is another life challenge," she says, emphasizing that Life's Door-Tishkofet is committed to helping people utilize their existing strengths, relationships, and community to deal with the challenge.

Corn explains that for patients and their loved ones, Tishkofet develops individual treatment plans with a strong emphasis on the emotional, social, and spiritual rather than the medical. "It's not just so you'll 'get through' illness, but how you'll grow. We want to ensure that whatever happens medically, there will have been a more fulfilling life," she says.

That message resonates for D., a 42-year-old with a degenerative neurological disorder, who explains, "When I was diagnosed, I thought my life was over. Even though doctors told me I had time until I would lose my ability to walk, I already felt like it was that day. All I could see was black and all I could feel was fear. I couldn't talk to anyone. After taking part in the Partners for Life Couples Retreat, I began to be able to

Showing your best face at every age

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Wondering what your skin may look like down the road? Take a peek at your parents, as genetics play a key role in how skin ages.

Dr. Fred Weksberg, owner and medical director of The Weksberg Centre for Cosmetic Dermatology and the Toronto Vein Clinic says, "How you live those years is equally important. Sun exposure, diet, exercise, pollutants all come into play. I can generally see from a patient's facial structure and bones how they are going to age, and I tell the patient right away what treatment is right for them."

Non-surgical cosmetic procedures have changed the scope of Weksberg's private practice over the last 26 years.

"I was one of the first doctors in Toronto to start using Botox back in 2000. Patients came in asking for these treatments and it snowballed," said Weksberg.

A new generation of treatments is springing up to fulfil the demand for more natural looking ways to slow down the aging process for women and men who want treatments that help them achieve a fresh, radiant version of themselves.

Weksberg is a recognized expert in the field of cosmetic dermatology and sclerotherapy and is frequently invited to lecture and train colleagues both locally and abroad. He has published in medical journals, and sits on medical advisory boards.

Weksberg said, "Botox is an effective agent for the treatment of frown lines, which cause muscles to weaken. The patient will lose many of the lines and grooves that are directly caused by the action of those muscles. Common areas for Botox are between the eyebrows, forehead and crow's feet.

Botox is also used for medical purposes as in hyperhidrosis, excessive sweating. Areas such as the palms, soles, and armpits can trigger excessive sweat. Treatment involves a series of tiny injections to the affected area.

In 2011, Health Canada authorized approval for Botox to treat migraines. It can be very helpful in reducing the frequency and/or intensity of both muscle tension headaches and migraine headaches. Treatment consists of a series of Botox injections on the forehead, the sides of the scalp and on the back of the neck.

Weksberg teaches injectable techniques to other physicians. His practice has been named as the 'Centre of Excellence' in Central Canada for Botox cosmetic treatment.

Dr. Fred Weksberg

Hyaluronic acid dermal fillers such as the Juvaderm and Restylane lines are the most commonly requested injectables. They address the signs of aging in many parts of the face.

Fillers have now evolved from changing a few little lines in the face to looking at the face in a three-dimensional way, because as we age we lose volume in our cheeks, and we lose volume in different parts of the face.

Fillers are not easy to inject, he said. "It involves a lot of art and science. The face is like a canvas. It is how you put it in the face that makes all the difference."

In place of needles, there are lasers, peels and radio-frequency energy treatments, all of which work by stimulating the production of collagen, the protein that makes skin firm, plump and youthful, in turn rejuvenating the complexion.

Weksberg has perfected new techniques for thermage – the mini facelift with no down time. His practice also includes sclerotherapy to eliminate veins of all sizes, photorejuvenation for removal of lesions caused by sun damage, and skin peels which offer a combination of exfoliation and dermal infusion to improve and revitalize the skin.

Other procedures include laser hair removal, liposonix fat reduction and fraxel laser resurfacing.

"I see patients in their mid-20s continuing right up to old age. I have women in their 80s coming in regularly for laser treatments to help with their brown spots," said Weksberg.

share my fears with my wife. I was afraid at first, but now we are going through this together, as a team. I know that I have my moments, but when I do, I have the people at Tishkofet who help me listen to my inner self and find my courage and meaning to live. Every day is a blessing—really!"

Patients come to Tishkofet from all parts of Israeli society and are treated on a sliding-scale fee basis. At the Jerusalem headquarters there's an intake of some 15-20 new people per week, and the single-story house that serves as the Tishkofet base is at full capacity, with counseling sessions, art therapy, body work, and administration going on all day.

Tishkofet co-founder Dr. Ben Corn, whose day job is Chairman of Radiation Oncology at Tel Aviv Medical Center-Ichilov Hospital, also maintains academic appointments at Tel Aviv University School of Medicine and the Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia. In 2011, he accepted the National Award for Volunteerism from President Shimon Peres on behalf of Tishkofet for "changing the way people face serious illness."

Over the past year, Ben has been writing a popular weekly blog "52" at the Jerusalem Post. The blog has been another outlet for sharing the wisdom and caring behind the Tishkofet philosophy. A collection of his blog posts will soon be released as the book, Think Like You'll Die - 'Cause You Will.

As a physician who travels in both Israeli and American medical circles, Ben notes that "many senior physicians are not embodying a compassionate approach towards patients." Things are changing, he says, attributing the positive change to Israelis feeling more secure in their scientific credentials in the world.

"Israeli scientists are in the vanguard of cancer research and clinical trials. Once Israeli doctors felt secure on that stage, they allowed themselves to be open to entertain discussion of the human side of medicine," he says.

Both Ben and Dvora credit Israel's pioneering spirit for the success of Tishkofet's programs. "This wouldn't have happened in the U.S.," says Ben. "The inertia is too strong."

For Dvora, it's the closeness and intimacy of Israeli society that makes it easy to get access to decision makers and has allowed their community-based program to make a large impact.

"Plus, Zionists are dreamers and want to be actively doing something to change society based on Jewish values," she says. "Here the people in our midst matter."

The organization recently launched an international twinning program that will link communities in Israel with those abroad by providing leadership and volunteer training through the Tishkofet community caring model.

Along with expanding Tishkofet services to other cities in Israel, the Corns believe that their philosophy and many of their programs are transferable to the United States.

"The model is transportable; it will help tie Israel and American Jewry together," Dvora says.

Eating well as we age

Lisë Stern
JNS.org

We all have our traditional favourites – and for many this means Ashkenazi fare, like slow-roasted brisket, matzah ball soup, lockshen kugel, and perhaps cholent and blintzes. Unfortunately, such classics aren't the best choices for us as we get older.

Toby Smithson is a spokesperson for the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics and founder of DiabetesEveryDay.com. She says, "Age 50 appears to be the time when some of our nutritional needs change." Our metabolisms begin to slow down, so we need fewer calories – yet at the same time, we still need food that is high in nutrients.

The challenge, then, is to get all the nutrients we need without overeating. If you are physically active, great – though most people are not scaling the same number of mountains at 60 or 70 that they were at 30. There are also specific vitamins and minerals we need more after we hit 50, Smithson says, notably potassium, calcium, and vitamins B12 and D. We also need fibre, but slightly less than we do when we're younger.

Sodium is a concern in the opposite direction – too much can contribute to high blood pressure, and we need to significantly reduce consumption as we get older, to about 3/4 teaspoon per day (1,500 milligrams)—that includes both what we add to our plate and what occurs in foods naturally. Unless specifically made for seniors, prepared kosher foods can be high in sodium.

Too much sodium is a concern regarding blood pressure, and potassium helps blunt sodium's affect, Smithson says. Calcium, coupled with vitamin D, helps with bone strength, and vitamin B12 protects against anemia. Fibre serves multiple purposes—it helps with digestion and heart health, and can help prevent certain kinds of cancer. Good sources include fruits and vegetables, as well as whole grains like oatmeal and brown rice.

For many in their 50s and above, choosing meals and preparing their own food may not be an issue. But as the Jewish population ages, more and more people are living on their own, with family far away. Jewish organizations offer services to this group. Meals on Wheels supplies a daily meal to seniors and those who cannot easily get out of the house.

The National Osteoporosis Foundation indicates that our vitamin D needs can almost double once we hit 50—those under a half century need 400 to 800 IU daily, while those over need 800 to 1000 IU.

"Vitamin D is needed to help keep bones strong along with calcium," Smithson says. The primary natural source of vitamin D is sunlight, but how our skin absorbs it can depend on where we live, if we use sunblock, and how much time we spend inside, an issue for shut-ins.

If you don't spend much time in the sun, you may need vitamin D supplements; check with a health care provider for the best balance.

In general, the most efficient source for the nutrients we need as we get older is food, rather than supplements; supplements should do just that—help with what we're getting from food already. Food has the added advantage of being good for multiple nutrients. Dairy products, for example, contain both calcium and potassium.

Other good sources for potassium include beans (think cholent) and fruit, including dried apricots, prunes, and raisins (tzimmes, anyone?). Dates are also a good source, along with pistachios and other nuts. (Nuts can be high in fat, so moderation is key.)

Fortunately, it's easy to fit a healthy diet into a traditional Jewish diet—for the most part. Brisket isn't the leanest cut of meat, but it can be reserved for special occasions

"Many traditional dishes can be modified," she advises. "Dishes like lockshen kugel can be made with a heat-resistant sugar substitute and egg whites to make it more heart-healthy and diabetes friendly."

"The best advice is to modify recipes, watch portion size, and add more vegetables to your meals," she adds.

Suggested Menu for a Day

Toby Smithson suggests the following sample menu.

Breakfast: oatmeal, a glass of skim or 1% milk; 1 cup of berries, and a slice of whole grain toast with tub margarine, almond butter, or peanut butter

Lunch: tuna fish salad with reduced fat mayonnaise; 1 slice low fat cheese; 2 slices whole grain bread, 1 cup baby bell peppers, 1 peach or nectarine.

Snack: 3 graham cracker squares, 6 ounces low fat vanilla yogurt sprinkled with cinnamon and chopped almonds.

Dinner: 3 ounces baked skinless chicken breast with rosemary; 1 medium sweet potato; 1 cup green beans; an orange.

Suggested Shabbat Meal

Shabbat: chicken soup with whole grain noodles; cholent with more beans than meat; a green leafy salad with bite-sized raw vegetables; baked sliced apples with cinnamon and sugar substitute.

Toronto therapist brings handwriting analysis mainstream

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to The CJN

You may have seen Annette Poizner's celebrity handwriting analysis in Reader's Digest or the Huffington Post, but she doesn't do bar or bat mitzvahs, weddings or street fairs. Far from its mumbo-jumbo connotations of the past, modern graphology isn't a parlour game. According to Poizner, it's a useful tool for personality insight – and a major catalyst for change.

Graphology isn't taken seriously in North America, says Poizner, who has a master of science in social work from Columbia University in New York and a doctorate of education in counselling psychology from University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Elsewhere, it's given far more respect – including in Israel, where its power and accuracy is well known. Poizner says, "It's very common in Israel to have handwriting analysis for anything that involves entry to a kibbutz, a job. It's fairly familiar to Israelis that there's probably going to be some handwriting analysis."

So why the bad reputation here? The popularity of graphology has worked against it. "People read a few books and do that bat mitzvah party," says Poizner.

She set out to re-establish graphology as a serious clinical tool with her textbook, Clinical Graphology: An Interpretive Manual for Mental Health Practitioners (2012, Charles C Thomas Publisher).

"When you want to bring something new to the field," says Poizner, "you need to talk to clinicians." Her textbook, "published by a peer-reviewed, academic publishing house which publishes classics… of psychological measurement and psychiatry," proves the respectability of her discipline. "It's a scholarly, academic piece of work."

She also teaches workshops for the Canadian Psychological Association and for undergrads in related fields. "I want to make this tool accessible, particularly [to] those who are in private practice," she says.

Many in the academic world also claim that graphology's reliability hasn't been established experimentally. Yet this is also true even for several popular and widely accepted techniques in psychology. It's difficult to study handwriting empirically, says Poizner. Many factors influence our handwriting, like "alcohol, medical problems, cognitive difficulties, visual problems."

Graphology shouldn't be used alone, she says. "I never use it in isolation… I have people make up a story, have them draw pictures… tell me their dreams.

Annette Poizner

"It's a launch pad for therapeutic conversation that is rich," she says. "When you use different techniques and see the same theme from all the different modalities, you tend to get a hit."

Graphology changes the dynamic of therapy, with clients more involved, feeling excited and motivated. Therapists "get to know their clients better, faster," and can also present problems in a neutral way, demonstrating handwriting features and asking, "Do you see what I see?"

"Looking at something on the page, it's not them… it allows people to step away and… be a little more objective. In that state, you can really intervene better."

There are sometimes surprises. One couple came in to see Poizner because the wife had serious complaints about the husband. She doesn't usually do graphology with couples, but had them write their names, address, and a few other details. When she glanced at the samples, something struck her, and she told the woman, "What I'm seeing… [is that] you are a very independent, competent, bright, professional woman," all traits which had helped her succeed professionally.

"But," Poizner went on, "it would be hard for you to allow vulnerability and moments of dependency to allow your husband to really dock in this relationship. I can imagine him staying away quite a bit because he couldn't find traction as a man."

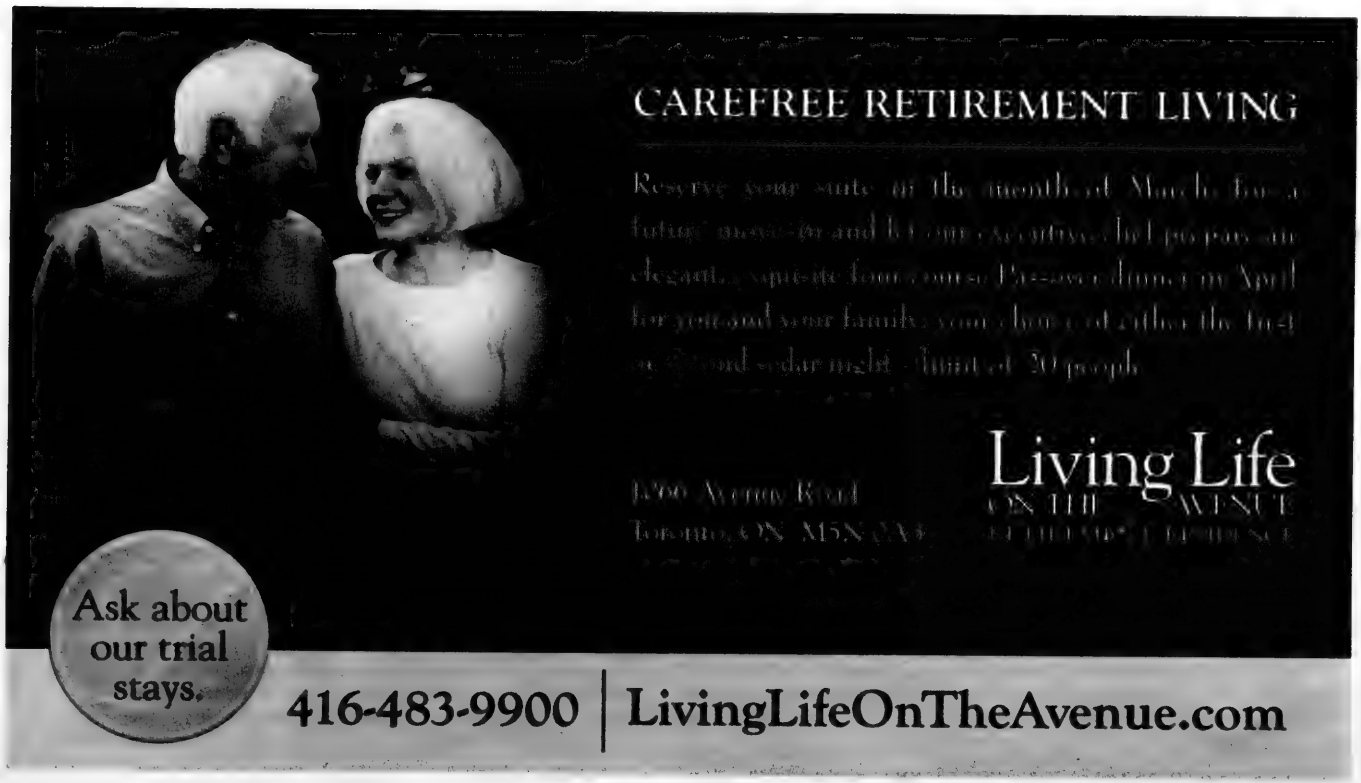
"Sure enough, I never needed to see him again."

Poizner continued to meet privately with the wife. "She needed to evolve to the point where she really was relationship material." Once the wife's issues were resolved, the husband "could come out of his protective zone of working all the time."

These days, Poizner is busy spreading the word. She also often speaks to groups of non-therapists, and while she'll answer general questions afterwards, won't analyze handwriting on the spot. "I don't stand on one foot and look at that signature." Her media work, analyzing handwriting of politicians and celebrities, focuses on informing the public about this powerful tool.

"If you put it out there like that," she says, "people go to their therapist and ask, 'Do you analyze handwriting, by the way?'"

She says, "We often lose the value of the written word. We have to come home to it. It's absolutely invaluable for therapeutic purposes."



Physican specializes in anti-aging medicine

Many physicians are starting to embrace holistic medicine by working more collaboratively with alternative health practitioners.

But Dr. Sheryl Brown has taken holistic health a step further. She is a physician, as well as a practitioner of integrative medicine.

Brown, a member of Genesis Professional Group, is a board-certified specialist in anti-aging medicine. She received this designation through a master's program in integrative medicine at the University of Miami.

She notes that integrative medicine is supported by peer-reviewed research. However, evidence-based studies showing the benefits of holistic medicine tend to be more prevalent in European medical journals than in North American ones.

In her practice she combines nutritional supplementation and lifestyle counselling with conventional medical treatment.

"Integrative medicine gives you more options. It's nice to have an array of choices that you can use with a patient."

And integrative medicine plays an important role in anti-aging medicine, she says, pointing out that scientific research has shown that one's genetic disposition is only responsible for 30 per cent of one's health. "What we have learned is that 70 per cent of health is based on lifestyle choices, and this impacts on how we age.

We know that a positive attitude to life can often affect longevity.

"This knowledge can empower people to take a more proactive approach in their health. A healthy diet, adequate sleep, stress reduction and regular exercise can increase your longevity and improve the quality of life as you grow older.

"Anti-aging medicine is about aging with vitality. It's about growing old and having a good quality of life."

Brown says chronic diseases of aging like type 2 diabetes and cardiovascular disease can be prevented by following a healthy lifestyle.

Type 2 diabetes can even be reversed in the early stages with such interventions as an exercise program and a diet that limits processed foods. "Carbohydrates like white flour, white rice, potatoes and sugar, all cause the immediate elevation of blood sugar. That surge taxes the pancreas, because it has to produce more insulin.

"Over time, people become insulin resistant or glucose intolerant. It's a pre-diabetic state. That's the ideal time to intervene with diet and exercise."

Metformin, a pharmaceutical that helps control blood sugar, may often be used at this early stage of the disease, she says. "We get great results with Metformin, but lifestyle changes impacts blood sugar levels even more."

Scientists are also developing new theories about cardiovascular disease, Brown says. "Natural saturated fats like butter and coconut oil eaten in moderation are not as problematic as we previously thought.

"It's actually simple carbohydrates found in many processed foods and hydrogenated oils or trans fats that are now viewed as key culprits in heart disease."

She says the nutritional recommendations for heart disease for the amount of fat in one's diet can be "confusing terrain" to sort out. "Instead of people worrying excessively about the amount of fat in their diet, an approach for heart-smart eating would be to focus less on the fat in foods and concentrate instead on minimizing simple carbs in the diet and eliminating trans fats altogether."

Brown recommends a Mediterranean-style diet, which is high in fresh fruit and vegetables, nuts, legumes, fish and healthy fats found in olive oil and avocados. But the processed grains found in bread should be consumed in moderation.

She says people can still indulge in some "sin foods" like desserts and pasta at social gatherings and holidays. "You do have to live a little bit."

Osteoarthritis, inflammation and/or stiffness of the joints caused by wear and tear, is another disease commonly linked to aging. While acknowledging that moving with arthritis can be painful, Brown still prescribes exercise, because it increases the flow of oxygen and nutrients in to the inflamed area and that can stimulate some healing. "If you don't use a joint it degenerates. I'm talking about mild to moderate arthritis."

Dr. Sheryl Brown

She says an anti-inflammatory diet, which combines raw and cooked foods can also help people with arthritis. Such a diet includes foods like cherries, strawberries, cucumbers, celery and an adequate amount of greens. "I recommend green tea, which is highly anti-inflammatory.

"I've also been reading literature on Boswellia, a plant that has anti- inflammatory properties. The studies hinted that compounds from this plant may help to improve arthritis somewhat."

Sleep can also affect the aging process, she says. "Sleep is huge. Sleep is a dynamic process that enables the body to heal and repair itself."

Some sleep problems like insomnia are linked to high stress levels and according to Brown, stress can impact the aging process. "People who are unable to manage stress tend to produce too much adrenalin. It can lead to the depletion of some of the minerals and nutrients that would otherwise be utilized by the immune system."

Aging is linked to the body's immune health, Brown says. "We know that as we age, so does our immune system, so any strategy that optimizes immune function is going to contribute to longevity.

"We know that a positive attitude to life can often affect longevity. Optimism empowers people and that sense of empowerment and well-being indirectly boosts immune system functioning."

Israel's "olim cholim" undaunted by illness

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to the CJN

It's so common here in Israel that there's a name for it: olim cholim – sick immigrants, laid low with the many ailments that are rumoured to plague us for our first couple of years here. At first I thought it was just a rumour. We arrived in August, and months later, we'd seen no sign of nasty bugs.

Then, winter hit. Winter in Israel changes everything: it's damp and cold, open season for every virus and bacteria out there. You wouldn't think cold would be a problem for hardy Torontonians, but without insulation and central heating, even a little cold can set off lung problems and other complaints.

"Olim tend to pick up everything their first year in Israel," says Tziona, a Torontonian and mother of four who's lived in Israel for 11 years. "It gets better after they build up some immunity to the new bugs."

Our new family doctor recommended flu shots, especially given our son's history of mild asthma. We were confident that, with this additional insurance policy, we could be even more sure that the worst of winter's ailments would pass us by.

They didn't. So far, it's been an endless round of fevers, sore throats, coughs, sniffles, and tummy complaints. Staying in school for an entire week has become a novelty for our kids. They're probably even more vulnerable because, having been homeschooled back in Toronto, this is their first time in an institutional setting. And our youngest is in gan, an Israeli kindergarten populated by over a dozen four-to-six-year-olds with very little comprehension of the benefits of soap and warm water.

Another Hebrew pun on the term olim chadashim (new immigrants) playfully refers to these bugs as cholim chadashim (new sick people), but for some, it's no joke. Mom of two, Rachel, who arrived from Toronto a few weeks before we did, lists her family's health problems over the last six months. "Pneumonia, two tummy viruses... every two weeks a cold, and we pass it around to each other."

According to Dr. Andy Levy, a professor at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology's faculty of medicine, "it's very logical, when you're moving to anyplace... With someone coming from Israel to the United States, the same thing would happen."

In each geographic area, Levy explains, newcomers encounter brand-new viruses and bacteria, along with slight variations on "familiar" bacteria and viruses. With those small changes, he says, "you're no longer immune to them." These organisms can be transmitted by healthy people, not just those who are sick.

An oleh of 16 years, he adds that "olim in general are under stress, not sleeping right, not eating right... stress in general increases your risk of getting sick and depresses the immune system."

Levy finds olim are particularly sensitive to airborne pathogens (through coughs and sneezes), and to pathogens in the water "that people who have lived here for years don't seem to be bothered by." Many also suffer from chronic gastrointestinal problems (diarrhea, bloating, food intolerances) for one or two years.

Avraham, another former Torontonian, says, "Most of us got gastrointestinal sick for as short a time as a week (the kids), and as long as six weeks (for me) within a few months of arrival. Then we didn't get sick with anything for about three years... A rough start, but welcome relief from our usual round of ongoing seasonal ailments in Toronto."

But the olim cholim phenomenon doesn't hit everybody. Michal, a Tennessee native who married a Torontonian before making aliyah, says, "I don't think we were sick at all in our first year. Granted, it was 11 years ago, but nothing stands out."

Levy has a few suggestions for staying healthy. "Exercise and keep as regular a schedule as possible; often these things are disturbed when we make aliyah. Consider getting purified water rather than tap water," he advises, though he "can't say there has been any rigorous study proving that really prevents illness." "If you are over 65, have a lung condition or a heart condition get the annual pneumovax [against pneumonia]." Finally, "be careful of where you buy your food; this seems obvious, but there is considerably less regulation here."

As for my family, I tell myself our adjustment period will end soon. And I'm heartened to know that some olim even end up healthier than they were before the move.

Avraham believes that his family has actually been healthier since moving to Israel than they ever were in Toronto. Living in Ma'alot, a small Upper Galilee city, he says, "our use of Ventolin and inhalers for my daughter and myself dropped from several times a month to a few times a year... [I] never thought of Toronto as a big ball of allergens and pollution before."

Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai taught, "the Land of Israel is acquired only through suffering." He probably meant war, famine and other persecution more than the common cold... in which case, we should pass the tissues and count ourselves lucky.

Holistic nutritionist aims to educate

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Craving sweets and suffering from insomnia were just a couple of the symptoms Marsha Fenwick, registered holistic nutritionist, was experiencing on a regular basis, and which led her to study at the Institute of Holistic Nutrition.

"I now look at the body as a whole, with a focus on the underlying and root cause of health and well-being, to uncover nutritional deficiencies, imbalances, and overloads," said Fenwick.

Mainstream medicine may not emphasize the significance of poor nutrition as a cause of a wide range of health disorders.

Research in the last five years has identified many links between the food we eat and chronic inflammation. Chronic inflammation and poor nutrition are associated with numerous diseases and disorders, including many forms of cancer.

Fenwick said, "I advocate an anti-inflammatory whole-food diet in my practice which includes eating plenty of fruits and vegetables that are high in antioxidants, as well as lean protein, replacing refined carbohydrates with healthy fats, herbs, and spices, and avoiding refined flours, sugars, and other packaged and processed food.

"The fundamental recommendations for everyone include eating whole, locally grown foods (organic when possible) and trying to remove as many toxins as possible from your environment."

Experts say nutrition can help improve outcomes associated with many illnesses and disease. These include obesity, high cholesterol, high blood pressure, heart disease, hormone fluctuations, and inflammatory diseases such as arthritis and colitis, as well as links to disorders such as autism and Alzheimer's disease.

Even environmental toxins can overload people with heavy metals such as mercury, and can lead to many chronic illnesses.

Fenwick is in private practice with a focus on women's health including hormones and weight loss, as well as health conditions such as diabetes, cardiovascular health, gastrointestinal issues, and autoimmune diseases. "I am striving to teach people how to eat to optimize their health at any age. No matter what stage of life you are in, I will guide you to success through a series of small changes. Small changes can lead to big differences. I do this by analyzing a client's diet, lifestyle, and environmental factors. This information is used to create an optimized nutrition protocol.

"My client came to me complaining of migraine headaches, bloating after meals and insomnia, and she wanted to lose some weight. She also ate on the run, occasionally skipping meals.

After a detailed health review, along with a five-day food journal analysis, I suspected food intolerances, poor food combining and a lack of macronutrients potentiating blood sugar fluctuations.

"My recommended nutrition and lifestyle protocol included a high protein breakfast – essential to boost her metabolism, improve appetite control, and balance blood sugar swings. I provided a 'prepare ahead list' of meals and healthy snacks to avoid eating processed foods on the run.

"Tips included increasing water, herbal and green tea intake. I suggested she have a small amount of apple cider vinegar just before lunch and dinner, which should relieve her bloating. Insomnia relief often requires balancing of blood sugar, eliminating stimulants and hormone balancing.

"After a six-week program to reinforce new eating habits with healthy food choices and lifestyle changes, my client was feeling much better with new long-term goals and changes implemented."

Fenwick shared a favourite recipe. "Razzle Dazzle Rainbow Salad Rolls is easy to digest, gluten free, soy free, dairy free and vegan."

Marsha Fenwick

RAZZLE DAZZLE RAINBOW SALAD ROLLS

3 rice wraps
1/4 cup sliced cucumber
1/4 cup sliced carrots
1/4 cup sliced beets
1/4 cup sliced mango
3 thinly sliced avocado strips
3 leaves romaine lettuce
6 sprigs cilantro

Dipping Sauce

1 tbsp. soya sauce
1/4 cup seasoned rice vinegar
2 tbsp. grapeseed oil
1 clove minced garlic and ginger
2 tbsp. finely chopped green onion
2 tbsp. coconut sugar to taste

Optional protein

smoked salmon
chicken or beef strips tofu

Place rice wraps on a counter or table top together with a large bowl of hot water.

Slip one of the rice wrappers in the bowl of water and allow 30 seconds to one minute for it to soften.

When the rice wrapper is soft, remove it from the bowl and place on a clean surface. Add 1/3 of sliced vegetables, 1 piece of avocado, and 2 sprigs of cilantro in the centre of each wrap.

Lift the long side of the wrapper and tuck it over the filling to create a log-like roll. Fold over one end. Continue by folding the other end over. Roll up the remaining rice wrap, pressing the end down to secure it.

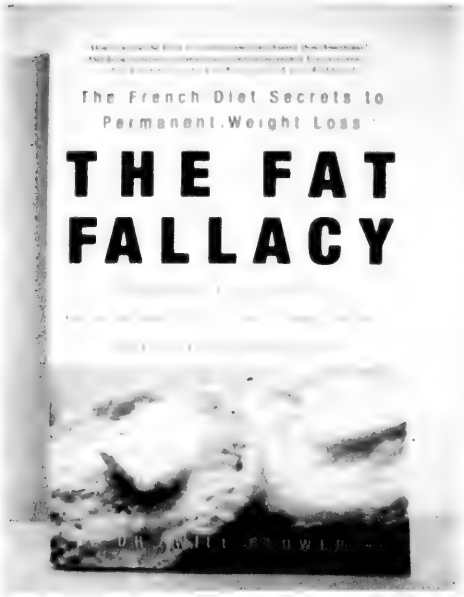
Don't get a diet, get a life

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

If eating exquisite food is one of our favourite activities, why do we drive ourselves crazy at mealtime?

Are our proteins high enough? Our carbs low enough? We've become diet junkies, jumping from one trendy weight loss program to another, because as soon as we've shed our 15 pounds – in just two weeks –we relax, pop a potato or two, the weight comes pounding back.



"The net result of all this dieting is we've begun to hate mealtime," says author and neuro-physiologist, Dr. Will Clower.

He bemoans how diet gurus have convinced us that unless our food tastes like cardboard, as in the ultra low-fat, plant-based diet of Dr. Dean Ornish; or is saturated in fat but bereft of carbs, forbidding even rice, grains and bread, as in the South Beach or Atkins diets, or has us eating prodigious amounts of one food such as the cabbage soup, grapefruit or popcorn diets, we are destined to live life as a double digit (sizes 12 to 20 plus).

"The most successful way of eating I know is the Mediterranean diet as practiced by the French," he says.

In his first book, The Fat Fallacy (Crown Books) Clower demystified the French paradox – how the bon vivants – who eat a diet which is 35 to 45 per cent higher in fat than our average American fare – can be thinner and healthier than we are.

"One of the biggest differences is that the French eat real food; Americans eat food products. Others have written about it. Clower backs it up scientifically.

In his second book, The French Don't Diet Plan: 10 Simple Steps to Stay Thin for Life, (Crown Books) he disparages fad diets and dispels the American myth that you have to spend your life on a diet. He lists the toxic chemicals in many popular food products, beseeching us to read the labels of long lists of multi-syllabic, unfamiliar names, we don't dare try to pronounce, and have no idea why they're there in the first place.

"Shouldn't common sense tell us to put that package back on the grocery shelf rather than into your cart?"

According to Clower we don't have to micromanage our molecules (counting calories, carbs and fats, and weighing everything we put into our mouth) or consult a list of "approved" items every time we open the refrigerator. Instead we should learn to love healthful foods and avoid concoctions dreamed up in the chemist's lab.

Here are a few suggestions from Clower, whose favourite maxim is "Life is uncertain. Eat dessert first."

• Say no to food fundamentalists preaching shame to carb consumers, blame to back-sliding bread lovers, and guilt to pasta epicures. Avoid any authority that forbids healthful foods such as carrots, beets, berries, bananas, beans, whole grain bread and pasta.

• Learn to love natural, nutritious foods – fruits, vegetables, dairy, whole grains, fish and fowl – preferably organic and grown sustainably. Enjoy your favourite sweets and treats, in moderation. Consume your carbs and fats together to diminish the rise in blood sugar and surge of insulin which leaves you tired, hungry and prone to weight gain. Spread peanut butter on bananas and apples; spoon Greek yogurt over your peaches; dunk your favourite bread into olive oil.

• There is no honour consuming cardboard or saying "no, thank you" to your favourite foods. Choose high-quality delicacies so sumptuous you sigh at its fragrance and savour its taste. Mealtime becomes an antidote to stress and the stress hormone, cortisol, which accelerates hunger cravings and causes fat storage.

• Eat real foods. Our bodies have a nurturing relationship with Mother Earth and need fruit from the trees and vegetables from the fields. They rebel when they're fed additives created in a chemist's lab. Remember, that appealing apple in the Garden of Eden wasn't genetically modified.

• You don't have to finish first or feel stuffed to stop eating. When we gobble it up or gulp it down we can't taste it and don't enjoy it. And most of the 20 minutes it takes to achieve that full feeling is spent indulging in gluttonous, mindless eating. Savour fabulous food and sip wonderful wine. When you eat slowly your body will tell you when it's had enough. Listen to it.

The cascade of molecules that cause your brain to say, "I'm full" come from various points in your body. That awful stuffed state occurs because you're firing the stretch receptors in your stomach, extending the precious organ's walls and preparing it to receive even more food next time. Not our goal. The object of eating a great meal is to make us satisfied. What does stuffing ourselves have to do with it?

Like Rodney Dangerfield used to say, mealtime doesn't get enough respect. Dining should be a highlight of our day. Don't eat standing up, sitting in front of the television, out of a brown paper bag, or off a paper plate. And don't discuss controversial subjects.

Make dining a remarkable ritual you look forward to. Whether dining alone or with friends, create a sensuous ambiance with beautiful settings, sweet smelling flowers and soothing music. Eat small portions slowly, savoring every bite. Put down your fork between bites.

The smells, flavours, and textures engage your senses, awaken your awareness to the bubbling sauce, chattering sauté, or the heavenly scent of freshly baked bread. To live this flavoured and savoured life of the senses is to find joy in the everyday act of eating. Sparkling conversation, savoury delicacies and interesting groupings of friends around your table creates a communion – in the best sense. And the cherry on the cake, you'll forget to overeat.

Research team studying genetic component of Trigeminal Neuralgia

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

About eight years ago, Shushanik Abrahamyan began experiencing severe pain in her face. Conventional analgesics seemed to have no effect and doctors in her native Armenia were at a loss as to what was causing it.

When she would go to a party, the pain would commence as soon as the band began to play. She had to leave immediately.

Some physicians thought it might be some kind of severe migraine and her friends and family began to think she might be imagining it. "Nobody took her seriously," said Abrahamyan's daughter, Ana Nahapetyan.

The pain was like a severe jolt in her molars. Abrahamyan asked dentists to remove the teeth, but she was turned down. They seemed healthy. Finally she found a dentist who would do it for her and in the end, six of her teeth were pulled. The pain persisted.

A chance conversation at the offices of The CJN marked the first step to her getting relief. Ana was speaking to fellow employee and Ask Ella columnist Ella Burakowski about her mother's travails and Ella recognized immediately what she was going through. It was the same type of pain she herself experienced many years ago.

Have your mother take Tegretol for a few weeks and see if that helps, she advised.

Ana passed along the advice and her mom, desperate for anything that could spell an end to the agony, purchased the medication from her pharmacist (in Armenia you can get any sort of drug without a prescription, Ana said).

"She was desperate, she was living on pain killers, every kind, but they didn't help her," Ana said.

Abrahamyan took the Tegretol and within a couple of weeks the pain was gone.

When she was first stricken with Trigeminal Neuralgia in 1992, Burakowski experienced pain similar to what Abrahamyan went through. "It's like being shocked with an electric prod," she said. It could be brought on by brushing the teeth, touching the cheek or just having a meal.

Burakowski too approached her cousin, an endodontist, and asked him to remove her teeth. He could find nothing wrong with them and wouldn't do it. A trip to a gum specialist didn't help and after a time she was referred to a facial pain clinic at Mount Sinai Hospital.

On her first trip to the clinic, "the guy diagnosed me in two seconds," she said.

She was prescribed Tegretol, a medication used to treat people suffering seizures, and soon the pain subsided.

Ze'ev Seltzer knows what those suffering with Trigeminal Neuralgia are going through. A professor of genetics at the University of Toronto, Seltzer is part of an international team studying the illness. The project is headed by Dr. Marshall Devor, a Toronto native who is laboratory head and former chair of the Department of Cell and Development Biology at the Institute of Life Sciences at the Hebrew University and who founded the school's Center for Research on Pain. It is funded by the Facial Pain Research Foundation.

The team is exploring the genetic component of the illness – the predisposition of some people to suffer from the disease while others, who have the same nerve compression, seem to be untouched.

"This is a terrible disease," said Seltzer. "It is the most excruciating pain syndrome that exists."

Painful as it may be, only 70 out of 100,000 people suffer from it, making it extremely rare, especially when you consider that worldwide 20 to 25 per cent of the population will suffer from chronic pain sometime during their lifetime.

Ella Burakowski, four days after microvascular decompression surgery

In recent years, thanks to new imaging techniques, researchers have come to learn that 16 per cent of the population "have the congenital abnormality in which a blood vessel compresses on the nerve root," causing the condition, Seltzer said.

Researchers are investigating why only a small portion of that group actually suffer the excruciating pain, while most don't, he continued. They think there's a genetic reason for it, a gene or group of genes which predisposes some to experience the pain while others don't.

"We believe that the reason for the pain ... is a variant of one of the genes" or a number of genes that affects a patient's sensitivity to pain, he said.

Researchers are hoping to isolate the gene or genes involved so that a treatment can be developed, Seltzer said.

While there are currently treatments available, none are foolproof. Medication works, but it has nasty side effects. Vascular decompression surgery doesn't work for everybody while another surgery, which cuts the nerve, "leaves the face completely numb and sometimes even this doesn't work," Seltzer said.

Burakowski maxed out at 1200 mgs of Tegretol (Abrahamyan takes 800) but after 13 years, it stopped working. Even while on the drug, she hated the side effects. It made her sleepy and "you can't get out your words. It's nicknamed the stupid drug," she said.

Going without medication was not a solution. "You're left with very little quality of life. You couldn't move or talk. It's called the suicide disease" because some sufferers end their lives rather than continue with the constant pain.

Faced with the return of the pain, Burakowski opted for surgery. She interviewed six surgeons to find the one most familiar with the illness and in 2005 underwent microvascular decompression, a form of brain surgery.

Three months after the surgery, she was back to normal.

"I'm happy with how I came through," she said. "It wasn't nearly as bad as I thought it would be."

Simple gizmos take frustration out of daily tasks

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

While many active seniors have varied interests and live independently, they may find it difficult to perform a number of daily tasks they formerly took for granted.

Rhoda Weiner, 75, a retired nurse, went to work, entertained and, along with her late husband, brought up three children. Now, managing alone in a two-bedroom condominium, she finds chores consume twice as much time. "For years I thought nothing of it, but now it's tough."

Dina Goldstein, 81, says she has lived with arthritis for about 18 years, but that she is lucky so far.

"I can still make Shabbat dinners and wow the grandchildren with my home-baked challah and mandelbroit."

She enrolled in jewelry courses at a senior centre and has crafted necklaces for both her granddaughters.

"They love the colourful stones and I am pleased with the results. It's ironic, I can make the jewelry, but I can't fasten the clasp on myself."

Some of her peers confessed they had the same problem.

Rosalie Goodman, 68, remembers vacationing at her parents' condominium in Florida. "I was in my 40s and my parents were in their late 70s. Most of the residents were about the same age or a little older. The owner of a ladies wear boutique had showcased a recent shipment of high-end blouses at 70 per cent off. She vowed to never again bring in garments with tiny buttons. Now, I'm also having difficulty with similar tasks, so I know what she meant. At the time, I thought it was just sales talk."

Although arthritis and other conditions affect seniors, cases differ. Arthritis is a broad term used to describe a painful, debilitating inflammation of the joint or joints. Although lay people use this label, health professionals recognize more than 100 types of arthritis. People are affected in different ways.

At a community handicraft group comprised of 23 women, ranging in age from late 50s to 91, the disparity is apparent. Several women 75 and over use canes and walkers, but they are able to perform wonders with their nimble fingers. They quickly crochet and knit beautiful garments using fine motor skills. Conversely, a few peers the same age or younger march into class at a brisk pace but plod along to complete simple projects because of impaired finger dexterity.

Fortunately, there are some low-tech, inexpensive gizmos on the market that can alleviate struggles at home. Numerous everyday chores demand finger dexterity, strength and agile hand and wrist manoeuvres. Pharmacies, department stores and rehabilitation centres are likely places to find them.

Many products can be ordered online, and the vendors are reputable. Nevertheless, Health Canada advises consumers to check out companies to avoid disappointment. A device may have parts missing, been recalled since posted online, or not have been stored safely. In some instances, the vendor may not live up to the warranty or still be in business.

Medical devices must meet Canadian standards. The majority must be licensed before distribution. However, some smaller devices are considered a lesser risk, and therefore do not have to abide by the same restrictions.

Here is a sampling of some inexpensive gizmos found in local stores that have proven to ease doing up buttons, fastening jewelry, gripping jars, prying open containers and simplifying other mundane chores.

Pens with writing grips enable users to retain a comfortable, strong grip for an hour or more. These grips also work for people with writer's cramp. Devices made of soft, smooth vinyl that slide over a pen or pencil are inexpensive and easy to find.

Jar grippers come in many shapes and forms. Some are metal hand-held gadgets that grip jar, bottle and other container tops, and other resemble rubber caps that fit over any size container. Although donning a rubber glove and running hot water over the bottle may work well, specially designed grippers are superior and cost less than $10. Suction cups on the bottom of cutting boards prevent the boards from slipping. Some are designed with stainless steel nails to hold fruit and vegetables for safe slicing or peeling.

The conventional oven is still prominent in many homes, and knob turners are the answer if it's hard to turn on and off the oven.

Have trouble swallowing jumbo pills? Pill-cutters are not costly and very efficient.

It's a nuisance to struggle with zippers, do up buttons or fasten jewelry clasps. Zipper pullers, button hookers, jewelry gizmos, key turners and door knob extenders are available to make these tasks easier. When surfing the Internet, scout out government sanctioned sites such as Health Canada.

Search is on for permanent cure

Recording her experiences online and later on Facebook, she learned there were thousands just like her, going through the vagaries of the disease. She still updates her status on the anniversary of her operation, which has kept her pain free for nine years.

Not all surgeries work so well or last much longer than 10 years, said Seltzer. That's why an effort is needed to find a more permanent cure for the illness. The race is on to find the genes in question. When they do, it's likely not just Trigeminal Neuralgia patients who will benefit.

There could be application to others suffering chronic pain such as amputees or those experiencing post-surgical pain, even from knee or hip replacements.

The team is collecting a patient database of 500 Trigeminal Neuralgia sufferers in 10 or 11 medical centres. They are hopeful to have located the gene or genes in question within 10 years and develop a pharmacogenomic solution to it, said Seltzer, adding that the costs of the study are substantial. Contributions are always welcome.

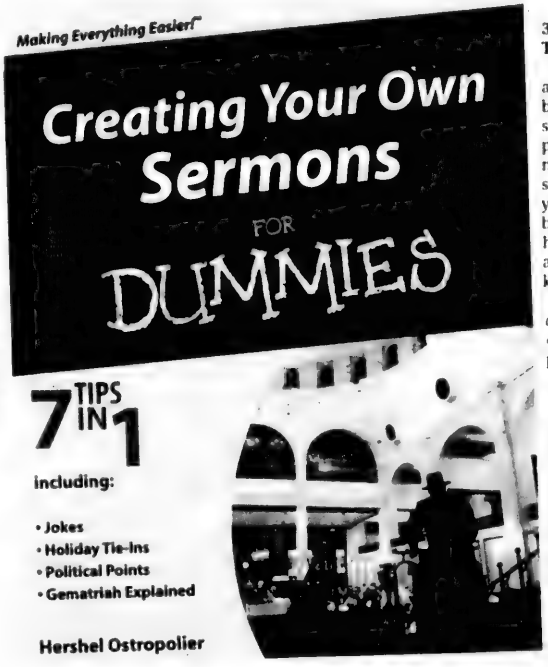
Skip synagogue with our DIY method

Write your own sermon in 7 easy steps

Hershel Ostropolier

You have built your own backyard deck, you knit your own neckties and you bake your own gluten-free bread. As a do-it-yourselfer, you can now avoid high synagogue membership dues by delivering your own Shabbat morning sermons from the comfort of your own living room. Just follow these easy steps and you, too, can be a stutter-free Moses. Happy is the congregation that will merit hearing your wise words.



1. Find an opening joke

This is the most important part of the sermon. Find a good joke and the rest will follow. No off-colour jokes should be used, even if you do say the naughty words in Yiddish. If you really feel the need to tell an off-colour joke at shul, the proper place for it is at the kiddush club.

Try to make sure your opening joke does not shlep on too long, or someone will call out the punch line when you are only halfway done the telling.

How do you stop a dog from smelling? Hold his nose!

2. Create a neat holiday tie-in

Don't wait too long after the punch line is delivered and the laughter dies down to remind everyone that the serious business of sermonizing is taking place. The joke was just a clever ploy to deftly slip a message of a timeless, deep concept into everyone's head. This stage of the sermon signals to the listeners that they can doze off safely without fear of missing anything.

Indeed, like that proverbial pooch, sometimes we must hold our noses when we read about the evil of Haman in the Purim story.

3. Something vague from the Torah

Even if you don't know much about Torah, you can make a safe bet that the Torah probably says something, somewhere, about the point you are making. And isn't modern religion really what we say it is anyway? Cement the point you are making as the word of God by reading a bit in Aramaic. It may have nothing to do with what you are talking about, but no one will know or care.

Yukum purkan min shemaya china v'chisda…

4. Make a practical political point

Be careful, people wake up for this part. Try to make the point of your sermon something dull, safe and obvious. At all costs, avoid any politically unwise controversy. Many zealous young Maccabees have been trampled to death because they unwisely chose to address a rampaging elephant in the room. In most situations, it is safe to denounce Nazis and terrorists. Speaking positively about Israel is usually safe. It all depends on the synagogue.

5. Speak the vicissitudes of life's travails with soaring rhetoric

Nothing dresses up a dvar Torah like a whole bunch of fancy talking. It shows that you are not only a Torah scholar, but a worldly intellect as well. If you can also toss in a few words in Latin or Italian, all the better. According to a recent study conducted by Popular Shmoozing magazine, the word Weltanschaung has been consistently voted the most impressively pompous word to use in a sermon.

6. Who doesn't love some nifty gematriah?

Gematriah isn't the wacky hijinks it once was. When forced at gunpoint to give an opinion on the topic, many youngsters express strong distaste for Hebrew numerology (and an equally strong distaste for being questioned at gunpoint). It's tough to pinpoint why what was once all the rage in eastern Europe has fallen into disfavour. Perhaps once upon a time using gematriah showed that you were a math wizard. These days, with a good computer program, anyone can discover that the full name of the bride plus the Hebrew word for "cabbage" equals the name of the groom plus one.

7. The blessing-filled finish

Watch out! Leaving out or mispronouncing the name of the bar mitzvah boy's uncle in the final flourishes of a sermon is a serious mess-up. If you find yourself blanking out on a name, blame it on a drunken stupor. Oddly enough, it seems to work as a valid excuse these days. (See interview with King Achashverosh inside.) Your blessing-filled finish could be a wish that we all merit messianic times, or it could be a whole lot more. If you're Sephardi, you can skip all the previous steps and the blessing could be the entirety of the sermon. Amen.

And that's it till next Shabbat. Pat yourself on the back for a sermon well delivered. Kiddush will be served as soon as the pizza guy arrives. Shabbat shalom!

CJN Scribe Traded

TORONTO — In a trade deadline move that caught analysts completely by surprise, the Florida Panthers announced they've acquired the NHL rights to slick forward Paul Lungen. Contacted at his mid-Toronto home; where he was shovelling his driveway for the 432nd time this winter, the CJN reporter said he saw the move coming. "I was in Florida recently, and I believe one of the team's scouts lived in the same Del Boca Vista complex where I was staying. He saw me power walking and must have been impressed with my stride and speed. Also that I knew what Corsi and Fenwick meant." The middle-aged, out-of-shape Lungen said his last experience in the rink came during Game 5 of the 2011 Stanley Cup playoffs in Vancouver. "The Canucks' Tanner Glass whiffed on a shot into an open net and my friend immediately said, 'Even you could have scored that goal.' Before that I famously heckled a coach from behind the bench, telling him I had my skates in the car and I could suit up for the next period if he needed me." To complete the deal, the Panthers are sending Roberto Luongo to The CJN. Luongo is expected to increase the weekly newspaper's presence on Twitter, as well as provide a weekly recipe column.

Cdn. Keeps Peace

JERUSALEM — Canadian Maj.-Gen. Denis Thompson was sworn in March 3 as head of the Multinational Force and Observers, a 1,600-person team of army, air and naval troops charged with keeping the peace in the Sinai Peninsula. Thompson was a brigadier general in the Canadian Forces prior to his new role, which lasts two years, CBC reported.

N.S. Newspaper Apologizes For Cartoon

TORONTO — A Nova Scotia newspaper has apologized after being condemned for an editorial cartoon that showed a Nazi swastika flag flying over the Peace Tower on Parliament Hill.

The text in the March 5 Pictou Advocate cartoon said, "Harpers [sic] Economic Action Plan."

The move came after both the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC)and Justice Minister Peter McKay, the Tory MP for Central Nova, condemned the cartoon and demanded an apology.

"The tasteless and inappropriate use of the swastika to make a political point only trivializes the horrific crimes of the Nazis," AJC executive director Jon Goldberg said. "Such a cartoon is offensive to the Jewish community, to all who suffered during WWII, and to Canadian veterans who sacrificed so much to liberate Europe from Nazi rule."

In a March 6 statement on its website, the Advocate said it "was certainly not our intention to offend our readers." It said the "cartoon was simply meant as a satire, or exaggeration, on Harper's Economic Action Plan and its implications for some segments of the community.

"We regret that the cartoon was not received in the spirit with which it was intended."

The unnamed editorial cartoonist also commented in the statement: "The use of the swastika was simply aligning the Harper government's policies with the Nazis," the cartoonist said. "All Canadians, but especially the Atlantic Provinces, should be absolutely irate over the latest budget and announcements which are continuing to oppress the poorer provinces. That is why I used the swastika. There are no religious connotations, there is no anti-Semitism, there are no ethnic attacks, there is no racism… Just the suggestion that Canadian politics is heading toward fascism."

Gov't recognizes plight of Jews from Arab lands

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

The federal government has formally recognized as refugees the hundreds of thousands of Jews who fled or were expelled from Arab countries after Israel's founding.

That means Ottawa will seek to have the plight of these exiled and dispossessed people taken into account in Canada's standing policy on Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations.

World Jewish Congress says 850,000 Jews were displaced from Arab lands in the years and, in some countries, decades after the State of Israel was established in 1948.

Current Canadian policy acknowledges the hardship of Arab refugees from territories that became part of the Jewish state, but makes no mention of Jews in Arab lands being persecuted and driven from their homes.

It's a breakthrough for Jewish groups in Canada and around the world who have been trying for decades to get governments to recognize the grave injustice done to Jews who had lived in countries including Egypt, Morocco, Yemen and Iraq for centuries, and even millennia.

They received no compensation from these regimes.

On March 4, the Stephen Harper government adopted the two recommendations made by the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international development in a report submitted to Parliament in November.

The committee says Canada should "officially recognize the experience of Jewish refugees who were displaced from states in the Middle East and North Africa."

MP Scott Reid

The all-party committee further recommended that this country should "encourage the direct negotiating parties to take into account all refugee populations as part of any just and comprehensive resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian and Arab-Israeli conflicts."

The New Democratic Party, the official opposition, however, did not endorse the second recommendation, but it did not provide a reason.

In an addendum to the report, the NDP agrees the experience of Jews in Arab countries "must be better known by all Canadians," and condemned the "injustices and anti-Semitism experienced by many Jewish refugees."

The government's decision was applauded by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which made extensive testimony before the committee when it held hearings last May.

"[The] decision brings Canada one step closer to recognizing the otherwise forgotten persecution of Jewish minorities across the Middle East," said CIJA president David Koschitzky in a statement. "This is not only a matter of ensuring historical accuracy. Once implemented, it will correct a fundamental imbalance in a Canadian policy that acknowledges Arab refugees but makes no mention of Jewish refugees resulting from the Arab-Israeli conflict…

"We look forward to seeing the government's support integrated into Canada's standing policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, on the premise that peace can only be achieved through a balanced and honest examination of Jewish and Arab refugees alike."

Purim's lessons for modern-day Quebec

Joannie Tansky
Special to The CJN

One of the basic tenets of Judaism is that nothing happens by accident, so it's no coincidence that Purim falls smack in the middle of the election campaign in Quebec.

Guest Voice

No matter how one looks at what's happening these days in our province, one thing is certain: both sides are fighting for the future. What transpires on election night will determine which direction this province will take. The stakes are high.

The festival of Purim is celebrated every year on the 14th of the Hebrew month of Adar, this year on Sunday, March 16. It commemorates the salvation of the Jewish People in ancient Persia from Haman's plot to destroy, kill and annihilate all the Jews, young and old, infants and women, in a single day.

Purim is a noisy festival. Every time Haman, the antagonist, is mentioned in the reading of the Megillah, children try to drown his name out with noise. He was the embodiment of evil. But why try to drown out his name with noise? After all, it's an old story that happened long ago.

Noise is a symbol of tension and conflict. Tension is a time of confusion when the lines between good and evil are blurred and an eroded value system invades our minds. And this is where we are in our beloved province of Quebec – in a time of loud noise, tension and conflict.

Most people strive for morality and inspiration, trying to create awareness of a higher purpose. They try to take the high road. They don't bend to the lowest common denominator, using devious means to achieve their end.

There are times in our lives when good is hard to see, when hope is clouded over, when our morale is down and it appears that evil will triumph over good. Purim comes to tell us that even in times of turmoil, tension and very loud, ugly voices, we must not lose hope

We drown out the noise of Haman even today, because as Jews, our Torah is not a history lesson. Nor is wearing a kippah. It's not a thing of the past, nor is it a meaningless piece of cloth. It is a constant reminder that there is someone higher than we are who runs our world.

Torah is a living, breathing entity. We run our lives by it. It gives us morality, purpose and shows us right from wrong.

Many empires have tried to destroy the Jewish People, a tiny minority in the world. They all failed, and those empires are nowhere to be found. Premier Pauline Marois may think she is building an empire, but if the initial foundation is built on negativity, using deceitful means, there is no foundation and the empire will, God willing, never materialize.

Marois may want a "secular" society to achieve whatever end game she has in mind, but she is forgetting a very important piece of information Nothing is happenstance. There is a God, and He runs the world. Therefore, we have nothing to fear but God Himself. Not Marois, and not cabinet ministers Bernard Drainville and Jean-François Lisée. We may be uncomfortable with some of the tests thrown at us, but we know that in the end, truth will win out. It has been proven over and over again in history, as it was in the story of Purim.

The true meaning and purpose in our world is peace and harmony, where illness will be eradicated and swords will turn into plowshares.

We must band together, take our present challenge and turn it into an opportunity to make our four cubits a better place to live. We must become stronger human beings with greater meaning and an even stronger purpose. We must take back our province and make it a wonderful, peaceful and honest place to live.

Joannie Tansky is the author of Girl Meets God, The Gift of Being a Jewish Woman, published by Urim.

We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. They helped us fulfil every sacred rite, from Shmira to Shiva. Our father was never left alone, and neither were we. Thank you Benjamin's for keeping the light alive.

PASSOVER SHIPMENT

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provide kosher for Passover food each year to the small Jewish community in Cuba. Kosher food is unavailable in Cuba, so the shipment is vital in helping the Cuban Jewish community preserve its traditions, observances and identity. It includes some 18,000 pounds of food for the 540 Jewish families (1,500 Jews) in Cuba. Pictured, from left, are Lisa Draper and Stephen Diamond, co-chairs of the 2014 UJA Annual Campaign, and Yael Karol, chair of CIJA Toronto's community advisory committee.

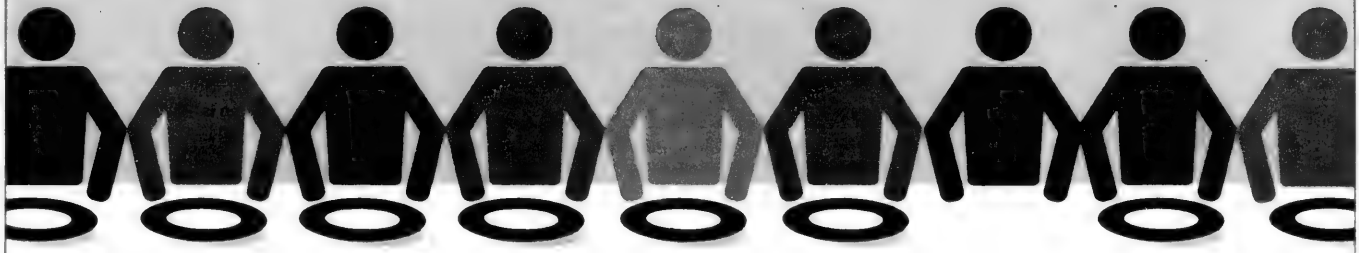
United Jewish Appeal
UJA Federation of Greater Toronto



Can you imagine
a Jewish holiday without food?

Probably not. But that's the reality facing thousands of Jews living in Toronto, Israel, Cuba and the Former Soviet Union who can't afford the basic staples for Passover.

But it doesn't have to be this way.

Please give to United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's Global Seder to Fight Hunger, to help Jews in need celebrate Passover in dignity.

Sneak peak at the new CJN

I've got some good news to share: next month – on April 10, to be exact – The CJN will debut a brand new look. It's a bold step forward for this paper, and we think you're going to like what you see.

In the coming weeks, you'll hear more about the exciting direction The Canadian Jewish News is headed, but in the meantime, I thought I'd give you a sneak peak at some of the big things we've got planned. Here are just a few of the features we're working on:

• Ask a Gentile: Sometimes you've got a question the rabbi just can't answer, and your friends are way too judgmental to ever risk talking to them about it. Now you can confide in our resident non-Jew. Every week, he'll be taking your questions, and drawing on his uniquely un-Jewish experiences to help you find the right answer.

• Lashon Hara 24/7: When we polled CJN readers about what they wanted to see more of in the paper, the overwhelming response was, "GIVE ME GOSSIP!" Well, we listened, and starting April 10, Lashon Hara 24/7 will bring you the latest dirt from your Jewish community. Who's living in a huge house but secretly getting a day school subsidy? Which congregant does the rabbi's son really have his eye on? Who wore what to the latest Jew-do – complete with in-depth analysis from our panel of experts! Plus, who's hooking up with who at your favourite Jewish community institutions?

And the fun doesn't stop there! Log on to LashonHara.com for up-to-the-minute gossip, and keep the conversation going by tweeting us @therealcjnlashonhara. (Note to self: check w/rabbi 2 C if this is kosher.)

As for those of you who love The CJN just the way it is, don't worry – we haven't forgotten about you. And to show our appreciation for your longstanding support, here's what we're gonna do: 50 per cent more pictures of smiling day-school kids. Boom! You can thank me later.

But the changes aren't restricted to the print version of The CJN. We're hard at work reimagining what cjnews.com should look like, too. Here's a couple of ideas to whet your appetite:

• We're jumping on the online quiz bandwagon! Get ready to be inundated with arbitrary tests that will decide, once and for all, your most pressing quandaries. Which Canadian Jewish community should you actually be living in? What character from Fiddler on the Roof do you most resemble? There's only one way to find out!

• Traffic on the 18s: How long is it going to take you to get to school in time for carpool? Get there faster with our new video feature. And when there's an accident on Bathurst Street, we're on it – live on location with the CJN Traffic 18 Team ™.

• For all you Montrealers: personalize your cjnews.com experience by selecting from unique options like "Stop showing me news from Toronto."

Yes, it's safe to say that on April 10, The CJN will change forever. So stay tuned. In the coming weeks, you'll learn more about what the new CJN is going to look like. For real.

Oh, and one more thing: Happy Purim!

Purim miracle in Crimea

Just like the Purim miracle, when fortunes were reversed and the Jewish People subjugated their enemies, we recently saw a Purim-like miracle.

On Feb. 27, U.S. President Barack Obama, in an interview, blasted Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for torpedoing the peace process. Everyone expected that when the Israeli prime minister came to Washington the following Monday, he would receive a very harsh welcome.

But something happened in between. On Feb. 28, Russia invaded Crimea. When Netanyahu met Obama on March 3, the welcome was quite friendly and cordial. Obama now needed support from Congress and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) in order to confront Russia, and he could ill afford to offend the Israeli prime minister.

Purim greetings from the premier

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to the Jewish community as you celebrate Purim.

Diversity is one of Ontario's greatest strengths. It is what gives us our character and heart. The Book of Esther speaks to us of the dangers of living in a society where multiculturalism is not valued, and where those with different faiths and traditions are feared and are forced to hide their beliefs. I am proud to be premier of a province where all people, regardless of their backgrounds, languages and histories, seek genuine and mutual understanding of each other's cultures.

Purim is a time to gather with family and friends to drink, feast, read the Megillah to re-tell this ancient triumph of the Jewish People, and to give mishloach manot and matanot l'evyonim. As you celebrate, please accept my best wishes for a joyous holiday.

Creating an activist

I was left shaking my head after reading Miriam Porter's piece ("My son, the activist," The CJN, Feb. 27). Nowhere is it more evident what impact we as parents have on the lives and opinions of our children than in the early and formative years. That is when it is incumbent upon us to expose them to all types of food, music, sports, books and cultures, especially if one is fortunate to be able to travel.

But in this instance, Porter is surely creating an activist in her own self-professed image, having brought her son to protests at the age of four, and hanging all 54 articles of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child in his bedroom – what bedtime reading! And vegan at the age of five? Take vitamins, Noah.

I'm sure Noah will go on to "Free the Fishies," "Save the Dolphins," "Liberate the Coyotes" and "Preserve the Frogs." I only hope that he also learns along the way that there are conflicting views and interests in this world, that change comes more often from within and that hardened positions, on whichever side, tend to be ignored and exposed for their failings.

'Feed the Deed' with Ve'ahavta

We set out recently on a nighttime tour that took us no further than downtown Toronto, but in the words of our driver, Amit, it was to a parallel universe, a society of individuals from whom most of us almost instinctively look away. We volunteered to man the Ve'ahavta outreach van that prowls the night streets seeking out and providing food, warm clothing, and much else to the homeless. As owners of a family restaurant that has been in Toronto for more than a century, we thought we would join the Feed the Deed initiative and deliver some of our own hot soup to people downtown.

We were not disappointed with our reception, and, we're glad to report, neither were they with our soup. It was -15 C, but we took off our gloves again and again to offer a sandwich, a coffee, a pair of clean socks or underwear, a wool hat, gloves and even a couple of sleeping bags.

Since our gloves were off, we had an opportunity to shake a few hands and to pass a few minutes just talking. Each person told a different story, but each one felt the pleasure of being "seen," and all were grateful for the visit and for the goods. When we got to the vegetarian split-pea soup, we met some skepticism. But by the end of our four-hour run, we'd given away all but the bottom of the pot (which went to our driver, a hero in his own right). Some of our newfound friends came running back to the van for seconds, and even thirds.

Our hats are off to Ve'ahavta. By caring for the homeless, they are taking care of us all, and they invite everybody to lend a hand.

Unmasking ourselves at Purim

Will the real self please stand up

Noam Zion and Steve Israel

We dress up at Purim. Dressing up is indeed one of the most common and popular of all the customs associated with the holiday. In some communities, it is only the children who dress up, and dozens of little Esthers and Mordechais can be seen milling around, jostling with Superman, Barbie and a dozen other products of child fantasy.

In other communities, the adults, too, get involved, and parties and celebrations, often riotous, mark the coming of the holiday. One traditional manifestation that was once seen in many communities was the phenomenon of the masked ball. People would not only dress up, but they would hide themselves behind masks so that it was only possible to guess their real identity. Even today, in those communities where adults dress up, it is always possible to see some very entertaining (and sometimes scary) masks appearing with the costumes.

We tend to see all of this dressing up and masking as merely a colourful custom, a harmless piece of play acting that everyone enjoys to varying degrees. However, we have to ask whether there is not something deeper that's being expressed with this activity.

The great psychoanalyst Carl Jung talked about the phenomenon of masking, but he saw it as a most serious aspect of human activity. He linked it to his general belief that all human beings wear masks in their day-to-day lives. He called these masks the persona of an individual (from the Greek for mask), and he believed that all of us go around with an invented persona, a projection of the person we would like to be and society expects us to be. Jung believed that the role of the persona was to hide the real inner self of an individual, the inner self that somehow was seen to be inadequate for public presentation.

As a result, rather than display the real self in interactions with society, people project an invented self, the persona, which they want society to accept as the real self. The persona, however, is, in fact, a projection of the self that the person wants to be, but believes that he or she is not.

Jung put it in these words: "The persona is a kind of mask, intended, on the one hand, to make an impression on another person, and, on the other, to hide the real nature of the individual. Society expects each person to fill perfectly the role that society has assigned them. A doctor should behave as a doctor and a teacher should conform to the expectations that society has for teachers... Society, too, demands conformity to certain polite standards of behaviour, and this is a motivation for a suitable mask. A person's inner life is lived behind a mask. At the same time that society tempts the individual to identify with his or her mask, the individual is also influenced from inside themselves. For example, a person will sometimes project a persona of being strong and capable, despite the fact that internally, he or she feels weak and inadequate."

Jung, then, suggests that our lives are lived behind masks. The real self is seldom, if ever, revealed. This, we suggest, raises fascinating questions regarding what happens to us when we formally dress up and adopt a mask, as on Purim.

Which self do we project at that time? Are we adopting a disguise and a mask, or are we actually dropping our normal disguise and letting our defences down in a way that we would normally fear to do, because it would "unmask" us in the eyes of society?

When are we more real? When we are formally disguised and thus released from the inhibitions of behaviour that normally constrain us, or when we are seemingly ourselves?

How does all this connect with Purim, an upside-down world that inverts the values of normal daily life? There may well be value in a society changing itself round and providing a sense of contrast to the normal way of life. This is something that can cause people to think about the values that inform their daily lives in a community.

If we follow Jung's ideas, we can suggest that far from dressing up and masks representing something strange and different from the normal self, there is a way that it can be seen as an "escape into self." In other words, if, during the rest of the year, what looks like our real self is actually a carefully constructed mask or persona that we choose to present to the world, hiding our real self, then the one day of the year when we dress ourselves up and behave in very abnormal ways – essentially reinventing ourselves – can be seen as a chance to reveal sides of ourselves that we normally hide. According to this idea, dressing up is a chance to reveal new and – to others – unsuspected sides of ourselves.

There are those who would argue, based on Jung, that these "true pictures of self" need to be revealed on a regular basis rather than hidden. It is the tension between hiding who we think we really are and revealing who we want others to think we are that's responsible for a lot of unhappiness and even mental illness.

By this logic, for a society to drop its normal social masks, necessary perhaps for the maintenance of that society as a social entity with defined cultural norms, and to express itself in a much more playful and spontaneous way at a given, defined time of the year, is a healthy gesture indeed. It might be seen as a necessary survival mechanism that allows the society to keep itself "mentally healthy" through the ability to blow off steam in well-defined and socially sanctioned ways.

No free speech for Zionists

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

Should mainstream Jewish organizations – museums, educational organizations such as campus Hillels, or Jewish community centres – open their doors to speakers and events that promote boycott, divestment, and sanctions (BDS), demonize Israel or repeat Palestinian myths? Does turning away zealots who claim to speak in the name of universal morality, while singling out Israel for unique treatment, constitute censorship and a violation of free speech?

A number of pundits have argued the case for infinitely wide tents, presenting various claims to back their views. One columnist in Ha'aretz invoked the "slippery slope" cliché, alleging (without evidence) that any limits would inevitably lead to the end of all debate in the Jewish community. And in the progressive Forward, an author claimed that exposure to the extremists provides a form of inoculation, helping Jewish students to fight back against the rampant political warfare on university campuses.

While such arguments might sound reasonable in an ideal world, where every perspective has an equal opportunity to be heard, the reality is very different. No tent, no matter how big, is unlimited – there are boundaries to every debate. For example, Jewish institutions do not provide platforms for Holocaust denial and blatant anti-Semitism. And while each group draws the boundaries of legitimate debate on Israel along its own lines, attempts to erase all boundaries, such as the exploitation of the term "apartheid" or false allegations of "war crimes," is foolish.

Then there is the problem of ideological discrimination – on Israel, free speech is often a one-way street. When many of the groups that are exclusively critical of Israel, as well as the more radical anti-Zionist organizations, hold public events to promote their views, these are generally single-flavour experiences. Try to find someone who disagrees responsibly with the activities of the New Israel Fund (NIF) on a panel at an NIF event or as part of their tours in Israel. Indeed, in a few instances, NIF officials have used intimidation to prevent community institutions such as JCCs from sponsoring speakers that criticize their agenda, which itself is often harshly critical of Israel.

One-way free speech is particularly blatant in the various pseudo-academic conferences on topics such as "Palestinian human rights" (because Israelis are not entitled to rights), "apartheid," and "the one-state solution" (meaning no Israel) that are making the rounds on university campuses. And among small groups of church activists who focus obsessively on attacking Israel, no "balance" or debate can be found. Critics of these poisonous agendas are generally kept far away, while pro-Israel (and even neutral) voices are muzzled.

The second departure from the ideal world of free debate for all is that the anti-Israel agenda has a huge war chest to pay for travel by a long list of speakers. European governments alone provide at least $100 million annually to non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that promote this agenda, enabling their officials (including a small but hyperactive group of alienated Israelis) to push their opinions on every available platform.

Much of this money is channelled through the Palestinian desks of government-funded European "humanitarian aid" church groups as in the cases of Ali Abunimah (Electronic Intifada) and Naim Ateek (Sabeel) – two of the most active Israel bashers in these venues. In addition, wealthy individuals such as George Soros and other foundations add tens of millions to NGOs involved in this one-sided political war, under the façade of promoting progressive and liberal values. And the campaign to divide the Jewish community promoted by the radically anti-Israel Jewish Voice for Peace organization, which is closely allied with the "Open Hillel" framework, is financed by a million-dollar budget provided by anonymous donors.

As a result, the waves of attacks against Israel and the multiple forms of demonization, particularly targeting young Jews and students, are unfolding on a battlefield that is far from even. And in many cases, ideologues from both extremes of the ideological spectrum – left and right, who invoke the language of free speech and "big tents" without boundaries – are often responsible for silencing those who hold more complex and nuanced views.

Lessons learned walking the dog

Yair Lootsteen
in Jerusalem

Two years ago, my wife and I got Natan, our son, a dog for his 12th birthday. Something he'd been nagging us for, for the longest time. He was smitten by a two-week-old Lab puppy we visited at a kennel not far from Ben-Gurion airport, and after reaching an agreement outlining his new responsibilities (I am a lawyer after all), the new addition to our family arrived home at the ripe age of six weeks.

Mooi, my Dad's apt suggestion for a name, meaning "beautiful" in Dutch and pronounced "moy," has changed our lives. She's brought much joy and unconditional love into our quarters as well as some new challenges. And now that she's two, we'll be replacing most of our living room furniture, having been told she's through the destructive stage of her life.

More than anything else, she has forced us out of our home. Three, four, five times a day. If you really want to get to know your neighbourhood, there's nothing quite like walking a dog, day in and day out. I'm now familiar with every nook and cranny and aware of any change that occurs in the geography.

Even more, I now know the neighbourhood characters – two of whom are a pair of wonderful, heavyset women originating from the former Soviet Union. One, from St. Petersburg, could be my mother; the other, from near Kiev, a considerably older sibling. They meet daily on different benches and just love Mooi. Turns out "moy" in Russian means "mine," and they're certain that's how we named her. They provide her with treats and she races to them upon catching their scent.

I would never have stopped to talk to these lovely babushkas were it not for Mooi. Nor would I have met Oscar.

At the end of our street, there's a large building, bigger than the others, which serves as a hotel cum residence, mostly for foreigners, here to get medical care at one of Jerusalem's hospitals. Almost all of them come from countries in the former Soviet Union.

Medical tourism has become an industry in Israel. According to an article published recently in The Marker, Ha'aretz's financial section, it's currently bringing upward of a half-billion shekels into the Israeli economy annually. That's roughly $160 million Cdn. We compete with Germany for this trade.

The problem is this business is not yet regulated, and in the interim, doctors, hospitals, agents all seem to have gotten into the action. In December, Uvda, a leading investigatory TV program, screened a report in which three respected surgeons were surreptitiously filmed demanding exorbitant sums of money from someone posing as an agent for foreigners in need of medical help. The story sparked suspicion that desperately ill patients and their families are being exploited and that public hospitals are being used for private consultations and procedures, detrimentally affecting the medical care we Israelis are receiving.

So what does all this have to do with Oscar? He's a Russian kid under 10, who's been living in that residence on my street for the last several years. He was terribly disfigured in a fire back home in which his father was killed and his mother rendered incapable of taking care of him. Apparently, a wealthy oligarch heard his story and sent him to Israel to receive the best possible medical treatment. He lives here with two Russian women who've also been brought over to care for him while he's here.

Oscar has undergone many operations to try and repair his appearance and to create some form of manageable fingers and hands for him. During his stay, he has learned a bit of Hebrew, as have his caregivers. He walks with them round the neighbourhood and has become a fixture. Despite everything he's been through, he almost always seems happy and curious.

Sometimes we meet Oscar and his helpers when they're spending time schmoozing with our two elderly Russian women. He likes Natan and Mooi and always asks about both of them.

I don't know if someone in the medical industry has made too much money on Oscar's case. It's plain to see he's receiving excellent medical treatment, and while he still has a long way to go, he looks much better than he did when he got here.

He has also taught many of us in the neighbourhood to be happier with our lot.

CIJA wants community to rate its performance

Interactive online tool allows for public input

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In an effort to address community concerns that the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is not as transparent as it should be, the Jewish advocacy group released an online tool last week that allows members of the Jewish community to review its work and rate its performance.

The 2012-13 Impact Report summarizes CIJA's efforts, initiatives, progress and ambitions. The report is broken down into seven categories – Israel, the boycott divestment and sanctions movement, Iran, Jewish life, social justice, anti-Semitism and outreach – all of which have sub-categories and topics that can be rated individually.

"This comes in response to the kinds of messages we were hearing at the very beginning of the whole reorganization process, which was that people felt disconnected from the advocacy effort that was being made," said CEO Shimon Fogel.

In 2011, a restructuring plan that saw Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada-Israel Committee, the University Outreach Committee, the Quebec-Israel Committee, and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada merge into one new organization, now known as CIJA, had many Jewish community leaders worried that long-term relationships built by the individual organizations would be lost in the transition.

CIJA was also widely criticized for not being transparent throughout the restructuring process.

Fogel said he hopes this initiative will address some of those concerns and will build the community's faith in the organization.

"We hope and believe that it is going to provide a lot of new confidence in CIJA. It's not secret that the whole process over the last couple of years has been the subject of a lot of debate within the community," Fogel said.

Shimon Fogel

"There was dismay or disappointment with the direction that the organized community went in, and I think this is going to go a far way in reassuring people that we don't think we're aloof from our constituency. We believe we have an obligation to be directly and fully responsible to and responsive to what they feel is important and what they feel we should be pursuing and the ways in which we should be doing that."

He said the report, which can be accessed on the CIJA website, offers facts and figures to give people an idea of the kind of advocacy work that CIJA does.

But it's the ability for community members to rate the organization's performance that is unique, Fogel said.

"There are lots of organizations that provide annual reports, but we have not come across anything where they're providing this kind of detail and access and capacity for people to be informed and to be engaged," he said.

"When it comes to the specific issues, we identify what they are, what we have done or what our interventions have been, and then, what we've tried to achieve. They get to assess that and to report back on whether they think we've done a good job, made a good effort, achieved a result or ways in which they think we can improve on what we're doing."

Fogel said CIJA spent more than two months refining the feedback tool and making it as user-friendly as possible in order to encourage people to provide their feedback.

"We realized that there are a lot of people who are passionate about what it is that we do and that some were feeling frustration, and if we don't reach out to them and get their input into how we present it in a constructive, positive way, then we are missing the target," he said.

"I think that we're going to review all of the comments and if necessary, adjust to the patterns that emerge from the comments and reactions. I think we'll pay close attention to the issues that people are signalling are of paramount importance to them… and not least of all, it is going to give us an added pool of individuals who want to be involved and we can find a place for within the advocacy community so that they can become fully engaged."

Fogel said within the first 24 hours of the report being posted on CIJA's website, he received a number of emails and calls in response.

"I have to say they were universally supportive and positive. They loved the idea of what we're trying to do."

Que. authorities threaten to apprehend all Lev Tahor kids

Paul Lungen

Uriel Goldman could not contain his anger and frustration. The latest development in the saga of Lev Tahor had him boiling over.

For Lev Tahor, he said "you're guilty until you prove you're not guilty."

Goldman, a spokesperson for the ultra-Orthodox sect, was seething at reports that authorities in Quebec were planning to seek the removal of all children in the community, which is based in Chatham, Ont. "They've been investigating for two years, police, child welfare, and they've found nothing," he said.

If authorities had evidence of wrongdoing, they should have laid charges and taken the case, or cases, to court, he said.

Chess more than a game at adolescent centre

JF &CS program teaches life skills to teens

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Jonathan, 16, a student at Jewish Family & Child's Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, a school for youth with educational, emotional or behavioural challenges, says when he takes part in the centre's chess program, he's playing much more than a game.

The Grade 11 student, who came to the school two years ago with a social anxiety disorder, says chess has given him skills that he can apply to his life. "I have played before, but this is different."

Stephen, a 12-year-old Grade 7 student who came to the centre in the fall because of family problems, said the chess program helps him find strategies to complete goals, and it helps him focus. "We all look forward to it. It's a great opportunity for me to socialize with the other students.

"Some of us get angry when we lose, but we learn that losing is part of life. When we do lose, we learn what to do next time."

Run by the Chess Institute of Canada, the program began last year with high school students but this year, thanks to a grant to JF&CS from the Azrieli Foundation, it has expanded to include middle school students as well. All 34 students at the school are now in the program.

Dena Libman, Azrieli's director of operations and compliance, said the foundation made a commitment to the initiative for this year because education is a major part of its work, and "I was very intrigued with the chess program. It teaches academics, and social and lifestyle skills, all in one package."

Robin Cohen, manager of the centre, said the chess program has been "so well received, it has become part of the school's curriculum. It helps build responsibility and executive functioning, helps students to plan ahead and set goals, and improves math and literacy. Students are also taught to adjust when a chess move doesn't go right or they lose the game.

"It is wonderful to see kids who often have trouble sitting still become so engaged in the game."

Tal Granite, the vice-president of the Chess Institute who runs the program, stressed that he uses the game to teach life skills.

"It's not just chess. I teach them to apply thinking strategies and how to set goals. They learn time management, how to deal with their emotions, how to plan and make decisions, and how to respect other students.

"They also take responsibility for their actions, and take the time to think about consequences."

As part of the program, he also has the students make a list of the goals they would like to achieve this year. "We're putting life skills into practice, and we've changed the lives of the students."

Ted Winick, founder of the Chess Institute, said the program's approach is personalized and child-centred.

"We consider as paramount the well-being and total learning experience of each child. Simply put, we are more interested in the personal growth, social interaction and thinking skills of the child than we are in how good he or she can actually play chess."

Beit Issie Shapiro (BIS), an Israeli organization that's a leader in the field of disabilities, is starting to partner with local companies to spread its innovative programs and services across Canada.

The non-profit agency has an appointed Special Consultative Status to the UN's Economic and Social Council. This allows BIS to share its work and innovations with other countries and help people with intellectual and physical disabilities worldwide.

"We're looking at Beit Issie as a light unto the nations," says Gilad Epstein, president of the Canadian Friends of Beit Issie Shapiro (CFOBIS). "We want to encourage the innovation coming out of Israel and bring it to the Canadian community."

Among these services is an inclusive, fully accessible playground that CFOBIS is trying to bring to Canada. In Israel, it's called Park Chaverim and allows kids with and without disabilities the chance to interact on the same playground.

By bringing together kids at these parks, those who are disabled and have special needs can further integrate into society.

"Using a playground as a platform so that children with and without disabilities can play together is empowering for families," says Benjy Maor, Beit Issie Shapiro's director of international resource development.

BIS' latest innovations are apps for iPads and other touchscreen devices that kids with limited cognitive and motor skills can use.

The idea to develop these applications came from a group of Israeli parents with disabled children. They explained to the heads of BIS that their kids had picked up their iPads and were figuring out how to open and close the apps on their own.

Instead of developing apps, Beit Issie Shapiro spoke with web developers to find which ones they could adapt to work better for children with disabilities, Maor says.

The goal is to make these kids' lives, as well as their family's lives, easier.

These games help children improve their cognitive and motor abilities, as well as their self-esteem.

"The iPad has something about it that elicits motivation of these kids," Maor says. "We had one girl who was not using her right hand. Through game playing with her therapist, with the iPad, she now uses her right hand."

BIS is also developing accessories to assist kids who are unable to hold or swipe the iPad, ensuring that more can benefit from these apps and games.

For instance, it's working on developing waterproof iPads. Some children with disabilities interact better in the water, Epstein says. They can play these games during hydra-therapy treatment, in an environment that suits them better.

"For me, Beit Issie represents Israel at its best: innovative, inclusive, dynamic, entrepreneurial," Epstein says.

CFOBIS has been involved with the non-profit agency for 20 years. For much of that time, the group has fundraised for BIS. Now, Epstein says he wants to foster more collaboration with companies in Canada so that ideas and innovations from Israel can have a tangible impact here.

On April 27, CFOBIS will host its fourth annual Soccerthon, a family charity event at the Trio Sportsplex in Woodbridge, Ont., that raises funds and awareness for the Israeli non-profit.

Soccerthon is a family event to raise money for Israeli non-profit Beit Issie Shapiro, which helps children with disabilities. This year's event is April 27th at the Trio Sportsplex in Woodbridge, Ont.

Last year's Soccerthon raised $15,000. This year's theme is, appropriately for 2014, the World Cup. Teams that sign up select a nation they will represent and each has a target fundraising goal of $1,000, Epstein says.

The money CFOBIS raises helps children with disabilities in Israel, as well as other countries that BIS shares its knowledge and innovation with – including Canada.

BIS helps some 30,000 children and adults in Israel every year. It is a world leader in Snoezelen (multi-sensory) therapy to help kids with intense sensory difficulties. It's also the first organization in the world to develop a higher education program for young adults with learning disabilities, in conjunction with Bar-Ilan University.

The non-profit also benefits Israel's Arab community. BIS works with imams and teaches them how the Muslim value system should support and help people in their congregations who have disabilities, Maor says.

Shabbat Itanu focuses on being inclusive

Shabbat Itanu, an annual event that invites synagogues throughout the Greater Toronto Area to reach out to, and include, people with special needs, takes place this year on March 21 and 22.

Itanu, a committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was established in 2003 in the wake of the 2002 conference, Opening the Doors, hosted by the federations's Board of Jewish Education in partnership with Camp Ramah.

Robin Gofine, federation's vice-president of strategic community planning and engagement, said one key recommendation at the conference was the establishment of a standing committee at federation focusing upon strategies to create a more inclusive Jewish community for people with special needs.

Shabbat Itanu is one of those strategies, she said.

In anticipation of the weekend, which this year includes 26 synagogues, a brainstorming evening was held in the fall, led by Shelly Cohen, an advocate and founder of the Jewish Inclusion Project.

Cohen met with 20 rabbis from all denominations, as well as volunteers, to sensitize them to practical steps they can take to make their congregations accessible, inviting and open to people of all levels of ability.

Daniel Schild, a member of the Itanu committee and chair of Shabbat Itanu for the third time, originally got involved, he said, as a member of his synagogue, Darchei Noam.

"It is our hope that all synagogues include opportunities for people of special needs, who may have difficulties accessing synagogue and its programs," he said.

"We have this Shabbat to remind us to focus on the people who need to be included."

Robin Gofine

Weekend activities could include rabbis talking about inclusion from the bimah, and discussions about how synagogues can be made more accessible, he said.

"This could include ramps, making sure there is room in services for wheelchairs or walkers, and making Torah classes and programs accessible by elevator."

Schild said his synagogue has a bat mitzvah that weekend, and the bat mitzvah girl is putting together a pamphlet to welcome her guests and tell them about the importance of inclusion.

"She has always been interested in working with people who have special needs, and her dvar Torah will focus on inclusion in her life. She was so excited when we told her that her bat mitzvah coincided with Shabbat Itanu."

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, said his synagogue is bringing in Paul Rosen, a Paralympian sledge hockey goalie and motivational speaker, who will talk to young people as well as the rest of the synagogue community.

GENERATION TO GENERATION: Joe Dwek Ohr Haemet Sephardic School held its first intergenerational Grandparents/Grandfriends Day Feb. 25. It was a chance for grandparents to come see the school and enjoy a morning of activities with their grandchildren. The grandparents were welcomed with breakfast and making family trees, picture-taking and more. Pictured are Claude Bitton and his grandchildren, Yehuda and Eliana, working on their family tree.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

UJA event engages professional women

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Until recently, professional Jewish women in Toronto between the ages of 40 and 55 lacked opportunities to take part in community programs specifically targeted to their demographic.

An attempt to fill the void began Feb. 25, when the business and professional division of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Women's Philanthropy marked the beginning of a new chapter.

The inaugural event, held at the Lonsdale Gallery, featured guest speaker Simon Houpt, the Globe and Mail's senior media writer and author of Museum of the Missing: A History of Art Theft.

"Professional women want to interact and network with other professional women, and they want content in their programming. We are hoping to fill that need through education and engagement," said Shira Lester-Cohen, senior campaign associate of the Women's Philanthropy division.

"Alison Himel, our incoming chair for 2015, often expresses that the primary goal of Women's Philanthropy is to engage women in order to increase our donor base so that we can better serve our over 100 partner schools and agencies."

Event chair Caroline Bokar said the idea to invite Houpt to tell the true story behind the blank spaces on museum walls was that of committee member Leanne Hazon, also a journalist.

"The history of art theft is, certainly, a very interesting one, particularly alongside tales of its recovery. Its current day relevance was glaringly apparent to our entire committee, particularly since more than 1,400 works of stolen art were just found last year at Cornelius Gurlitt's apartment in Munich and, more recently, another 60 or so in his Salzburg house," Bokar said. Gurlitt had inherited the artwork from his father, who was an art dealer.

Houpt's lecture highlighted the unfortunate reality of art theft around the world. In recent years, this theft has captured the public imagination more than ever before, spurred by real life incidents (the snatching of Edvard Munch's well-known masterwork The Scream) and the glamorous fantasy of such Hollywood films as The Thomas Crown Affair.

The truth is, Houpt said, according to INTERPOL records, more than 20,000 stolen works of art are missing, including Rembrandts, Renoirs, van Goghs and Picassos. Art theft is the third-largest form of illegal trade in the world, as there is a great deal of emphasis on monetary value.

Aside from shattering myths about the subject, Houpt touched upon the search for Nazi looted art and then addressed several audience questions.

Bokar said she was "absolutely thrilled" with the success of the event. "We wanted to create a special evening at which career women and their friends could gather at a lovely venue, get acquainted and learn about an interesting and relevant topic."

She said another important component of the event was that it encouraged attendees to bring art supplies that the committee could then donate to Jewish Immigrant Aid Services for distribution to children.

"I was so immensely touched to realize that everyone participated so eagerly."

The business and professional division of UJA's Women's Philanthropy will hold its next event on April 3. For more information, visit www.jewishtoronto.com.

A special message for the Baycrest community

Community Matters

Bringing our Baycrest Vision to life

By Garry Foster, Interim President, Baycrest Foundation & Dr. William E. Reichman, Baycrest President and Chief Executive Officer

For those of you who are familiar with Baycrest Health Sciences, either as residents, clients, family members, employees or donors, you will know that a great number of changes are taking place on our campus—changes that will allow us to make a much greater positive impact on geriatric care, research, education and innovation in the coming years.

About a year ago, we consulted with hundreds of stakeholders to create a Strategic Plan for Baycrest that defines our vision for the future. This vision is bold, and is designed to meet the changing healthcare needs of seniors here in our community and around the world.

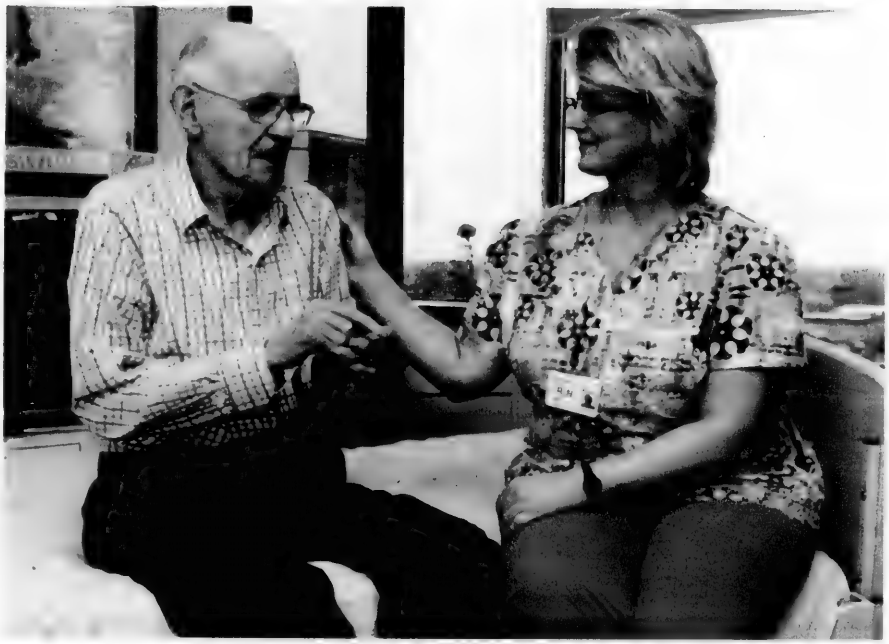
With our Strategic Plan as a roadmap to guide us, Baycrest will transform the experience of aging through leading innovations in brain health, wellness promotion and approaches to care that enrich the lives of older adults.

That's no small feat, but it's something we are committed to achieving. And already, we are making significant progress.

For instance, we are now providing group exercise and falls prevention classes in seven different retirement homes and community housing buildings, sharing our expertise with seniors who might otherwise not benefit from Baycrest's programming.

Baycrest is one of nine hospitals participating in the Transitional Discharge Model project, which provides professional and peer supports to clients who are discharged into the community from inpatient settings.

We are also leading the province's Behavioural Support for Seniors Program for the Toronto Central Local Health Integration Network, a program that takes a holisitic approach to care rather than relying on medications to manage behaviour. A mobile team of Baycrest's Registered Nurses and Personal Support Workers are now assisting 36 long-term care homes in managing residents' behaviours in our community. Additionally, a community outreach team is working with partners to deliver care, caregiver support and skills training beyond our campus.



Each of these initiatives helps us take our expertise to more seniors and align our programs and services with sustainable sources of funding.

In the coming years, we will also be harnessing the power of technology to help us achieve our vision. Through the use of telehomecare, for example, our experts will be able to diagnose, treat and monitor patients in their own homes—no matter where they live. No longer would our expertise be limited to our physical clinical space. Telemedicine in our Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged will bring on-call physicians right to the bedside using two-way videoconferencing, enhancing after-hours care and support for local clinical staff.

What remains unchanged here at Baycrest is our commitment to client-centred care, research and education that is deeply rooted in our traditional Jewish values. Even as we evolve to embrace new opportunities for revenue generation and to meet the changing healthcare demands of older adults, we will not lose sight of the legacy for Baycrest that has been passed down through the generations from our founders and long-standing community supporters.

Windsor BDS referendum was a first in Canada

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. — The controversial boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) referendum at the University of Windsor was a first for a Canadian campus and designed to be a "more democratic" way of endorsing a campaign against companies that support the Israeli "occupation," a spokesperson for the yes side said.

The undergraduate referendum on the resolution to support BDS, which passed by a vote of 798 to 585, "would give a more legitimate statement" to the campaign, which up until now has seen motions passed only by university student councils, not campus-wide votes, at least at the undergraduate level, said Mohammed Almoayad of the campus Palestinian Solidarity Group (PSG).

"It's much more productive in terms of some of the main goals of the movement," he said.

These include to "spread awareness… so instead of just a few student representatives in a room discussing it and voting on it, now all students hear about it and have to decide how to vote and they look into the research and are involved in campaigning."

The referendum has been severely criticized for its "abuse of process," a charge initially brought by the campus Jewish Students Association (JSA).

Association vice-president Josh Zelikovitz castigated the vote for being "rushed through in a way that would minimize debate, minimize dissent." A JSA letter detailed a long list of alleged violations of the University of Windsor Students' Alliance's (UWSA) own constitution.

Officials from the UWSA, which ran the referendum, have not commented on the charges, except to post a letter stating that it was "aware" of complaints that were to be made to its election monitoring committee. The UWSA's chief returning officer (CRO) is slated to submit a report to student council March 13 on the referendum.

The UWSA appears to be ready to accept the report, despite a request from university president Alan Wildeman that it "defer" it and the "finalization of the referendum process" until both the UWSA and the university administration complete a review of the way the vote was held.

"Should you choose not to defer the tabling of the CRO report, and the complaints are proven to be valid, the University of Windsor will have to consider its options," Wildeman said.

He said the administration "cannot allow student organizations to compromise the university's commitment to provide a welcoming learning and living environment for each and every student."

But in its response, the UWSA said it would be up to its discretion to defer the report and not anybody else.

"This referendum and its results are not binding on the University of Windsor but on the University of Windsor Students' Alliance, which as Dr. Wildeman has noted, is an autonomous organization."

The reviews of the vote also come in the wake of vandalism when a Support Our Troops flag belonging to a UWSA vice-president was desecrated with the word "Zionist" and a Star of David spray-painted on it. Police are investigating the incident, which has received international coverage.

Meanwhile PSG spokesman Almoayad said he was "disappointed" by Wildeman's intervention.

"But it's not surprising," he said. "We totally expected the administration and the president and everyone to sort of put up as much resistance as possible," noting "pressure" from the likes of the media, politicians – "from all over the place."

Almoayad said prior to the vandalism, which he condemned as a "hate crime," there were "no incidents" and the mood on campus was "very quiet."

The flag desecration, however, "created a lot of hysteria, a lot of students were upset asking questions – the administration obviously had to react."

Asked about the fact only a little more than 10 per cent student body turned out for the vote, Almoayad said that, at first glance, that number might appear low, but compared to other similar votes, it attracted more voters. A referendum last year on what to put in the space of the former campus pub "didn't even reach quorum," he said.

Brent Farrington, internal co-ordinator for the Canadian Federation of Students (CFS), said BDS has been a localized campus issue. And while the national student organization has taken stands on a variety of issues – from sexual assault to the Idle No More aboriginal protests – it has never debated a BDS resolution.

He said several years ago, a motion that wasn't about BDS but criticized certain Israeli government actions, came forward but there were "objections" because some of the clauses were not factually accurate.

Farrington said referenda, however, are widespread at the campus level and provide "a viable way" for students to make their voices heard to student councils.

Donald Sylvan, executive director of Hillel Ontario, said it's important to distinguish between student associations and university administrations, since the latter aren't affected by these resolutions.

"These are being done by student organizations that don't have any implementation authority," he said.

Sylvan also applauded university administrations for increasingly taking the initiative to ensure campuses remain peaceful and to protect freedom of speech.

"A lot of them are moving pre-emptively in advance to take steps to calm fears and make dialogue constructive," he said.

Canada completes term as chair of IHRA

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

The agreement by 31 countries that Holocaust denial is an expression of anti-Semitism may be the most significant achievement of Canada's leadership of an international organization devoted to Holocaust education and research, its outgoing chair says.

Mario Silva, a former Toronto Liberal member of Parliament and city councillor, who was chair of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) during Canada's one-year chairmanship, officially handed over responsibility to the United Kingdom at a ceremony at the British Embassy in Berlin on Feb. 25.

He cited the Working Definition of Holocaust Denial and Distortion, adopted by the IHRA's member countries at a plenary meeting in Toronto in October, among the top accomplishments of the past year.

"This definition will help identify and address a growing manifestation of contemporary anti-Semitism," he said in his final address.

Under this legally non-binding definition, denying the Holocaust means not only saying it didn't happen or minimizing its extent, but also calling into doubt how Jews were exterminated, such as in gas chambers, and whether they were specifically targeted for genocide.

Canadian Mario Silva, left, hands over the gavel to his successor as chair of the International Holocaust Alliance, Sir Andrew Burns of the United Kingdom.

According to the definition, denial also includes blaming the Jews or suggesting they created the Holocaust for political or financial gain.

Distortion may include saying the Holocaust did not go far enough or excusing the responsibility of the Nazis' allies and collaborators.

Silva said progress has also been made in reaching out to non-members of the IHRA, an intergovernmental body started in 1998 by then-Swedish prime minister Göran Persson, which brings together political and civil leaders, and experts. Canada joined in 2009.

Ukraine, South Africa, Australia and Albania attended IHRA meetings this past year, Silva said. Uruguay joined as an observer and El Salvador has expressed an interest in becoming one, he added.

Silva, a legal scholar, also termed "successful" a recent visit to the Vatican.

A continuing issue is access to Holocaust-era archives, he said. The IHRA has found that research in some countries is inhibited by "legal obstacles, prohibitive costs and the closing of archives," he said.

Of specific concern is a proposed European Union regulation on data protection, which could have the effect of making Holocaust archival access more difficult, he said.

Silva's successor is Sir Andrew Burns, who was high commissioner to Canada from 2000 to 2003 and ambassador to Israel in the 1990s. Most recently, he was Britain's special envoy for post-Holocaust issues. Britain, a founding member, previously chaired the IHRA in 1999.

Among his aims, Burns said, is to deepen the IHRA's professional expertise and thereby enhance its reputation and influence, and to generally raise its visibility in the world.

Burns said he hopes the IHRA will "make a practical contribution to tackling the outstanding contemporary challenges of rising anti-Semitism and incidents of Holocaust trivialization and denial… and [to increasing] support for Holocaust survivors, education of the young and opening up of the historical record."

Andrew Bennett, Canada's ambassador for religious freedom, was named this country's new delegation head of the IHRA by Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney.

The federal government undertook a number of initiatives related to Holocaust awareness during Canada's year as IHRA chair.

These included funding the digitization of Holocaust survivor testimony, the National Film Board's "virtual classroom" project for schools to use in teaching about International Holocaust Remembrance Day, a guide to Holocaust-related holdings at Library and Archives Canada, research to identify the origin of Holocaust-era artworks, and an award for excellence in Holocaust education.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) congratulated Silva on his work and thanked Kenney for advancing IHRA's aims.

"All Canadians can be proud that our country has become a leading voice in global efforts to counter hatred and discrimination, including the world's oldest hatred – anti-Semitism," said CIJA president David Koschitzky in a statement.

Quebec election campaign begins

Non-PQ voters 'angry and scared'

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Grassroots community activists in Montreal offered a gloomy perspective as the Quebec election campaign got underway last week, with the spectre of the proposed secularism charter hanging over the April 7 vote.

Businessman Gary Shapiro, founder and chair of CRITIQ (Canadian Rights in Quebec), described the mood among those who don't support the minority Parti Québécois government as "angry and, more importantly, scared" because of Bill 60, which was introduced fall.

"They feel they are being driven away. For most people their biggest asset is their home, and they are wondering how they will sell it and where they will live," he said

"The affluent will lose money, that's all, but for the less affluent, they are worried about making a livelihood. They live in fear."

A sense of helplessness prevails, Shapiro believes. "The answer is not the Liberals or the [nationalist Coalition Avenir Québec]. Anglophones and allophones were no better off under the Liberals. Both parties will bash minorities to appease the soft nationalists."

Nevertheless, Shapiro said he is happy the vote was called sooner rather than later.

"Uncertainty is the biggest killer," he said. "At least we will know who and what we are dealing with."

Shapiro doesn't think a PQ majority is a certainty. "I'm hoping [Premier Pauline] Marois has peaked too early and is counting too much on the charter. I'm hoping Quebecers will realize the economy is the real issue and that if they have no jobs, they have no life."

If the PQ does get a majority, Shapiro predicts the "quiet exodus" out of the province will accelerate and the economy will grind to a halt.

Jewish groups have consistently criticized the charter, which would prohibit public sector workers from wearing religious symbols, such as kippot and hijabs, while on the job.

In an interview about the election, Luciano Del Negro, Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs Quebec vice-president, acknowledged the "apprehension" in the community in the wake of the charter debate and with polls indicating the PQ could form a majority government. "But it's an open race at this point," he said.

CIJA is keeping in contact with all parties to apprise them of the community's concerns, but he said it is equally important for all community members to "make their voices heard" and be involved with the party of their choice, including fundraising.

Norman Simon, founder of the anti-charter group Canadians for Coexistence, said there's a sense of foreboding as the campaign begins. "Everybody is very anxious," he said. "I'd call it a desperate atmosphere."

A PQ majority would be "absolutely devastating," he believes. "They will do whatever they want to harass the minorities and discourage us from staying here."

Like Shapiro, the retired teacher hopes this can be averted if Quebecers are persuaded the critical issue is the economy and not the charter. He also has no doubt that Marois, as head of a majority government, would trigger a sovereignty referendum.

"She doesn't care about the economy. In fact, she wants it to fail, because it would be another reason for anglophones and minorities to leave the province.

"I know people who are real estate agents and they say business is already bad. And it's not only [the value of homes]. Small and medium businesses are horribly affected as well."

On the day the election was called, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal (CJDM) released two short French-language videos on YouTube aimed at "celebrating Quebec culture, while promoting tolerance, respect and freedom of conscience." The more-than-40-year-old interfaith group is opposed to the charter.

The first "Cher Québec" video reminds Quebecers of their capacity for welcoming immigrants and championing human rights, and urges them to reject the charter.

In the second, a father speaks of "what he discovered through the eyes of my daughter," when the now-22-year-old attended a preschool with children of diverse origins.

Also last week, the province's sole Jewish member of the National Assembly, Lawrence Bergman, announced he won't be seeking a seventh term as the Liberal member for Montreal's D'Arcy McGee riding.

At a March 7 press conference held at his constituency office two days after the election was called, Bergman, 73, said he was leaving politics after 20 years because he wanted to spend more time with his family. He avoided a question on whether his surprising resignation was asked for by Philippe Couillard, who became party leader last year.

"The only pressure on me was to return to my family," he said, denying health was a factor.

Bergman was acclaimed as the Liberal candidate last fall in one of the safest Liberal seats in the province. He usually got at least 90 per cent of the vote. The Liberals have announced that their candidate will be David Birnbaum, executive director of the Quebec English School Boards Association and, from 1998 to 2004, of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region.

Bergman said he has full confidence in Couillard's leadership and believes the Liberals will form a majority April 7. He criticized the PQ for "dividing the population," and said he believes a Liberal government "will bring people back together again" to focus on the economy, health care and education.

Addiction and recovery highlights conference

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Freelance journalist David Sheff understands the allure of addiction and its consequences.

While still a student at the University of California, Berkeley 40 odd years ago, his roommate and best friend died from a heroin overdose.

Even closer to home, Sheff's eldest child, Nic, struggled with an addiction to crystal meth for several years. Fortunately for Nic, David and the Sheff Family, there was a happy ending.

After several attempts at rehab – and close calls – Nic was able to shake his addiction.

Both father and son have written two books each about the struggle to deal with addiction – Nic from a former addict's point of view and David from the point of view of the parent of an addict.

On March 20 and March 21, the Sheffs, father and son, will be sharing their story with Winnipeg high school students, health-care workers in the field of addiction and members of the Jewish community attending the Jewish Child and Family Service's first time "Opening the Door – Conversations About Addiction" conference. (The other keynote speaker will be Paul Garfinkel, former CEO of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health in Toronto.)

David Sheff admits that he did drugs as a teenager and while in university. "Because I experimented with drugs myself, I can understand the attraction, and I am also aware of the danger," he says.

He says he first learned that his son, Nic, was smoking pot when Nic was 12 or 13. The response of his teachers, David recalls, was that it was no big deal, that lots of kids were doing it and that Nic was a great kid.

By high school, Nic had graduated to more drugs and developed a particular addiction to crystal meth.

"Nic was addicted for about 10 years," David says. "He was living on the street. He overdosed several times. At one point, he faced the possibility of having his arm amputated."

There was also several attempts at rehab on Nic's part, always followed by a relapse.

"Nic's been sober for five years now," says his father. "He has been working with a doctor who diagnosed a bipolar disorder. Often, drug problems are connected to other psychological problems.

"The last time that Nic relapsed, he recognized what was happening and got help in time. The accumulation of treatment programs helped him in the long run."

Beautiful Boy: A Father's Journey through His Son Nic's Meth Addiction, David Sheff's first book on the family's ordeal, was released in 2008.

"I wanted to get across the message that what happened to Nic and our family can happen to any family," he says.

"I also wanted to write about the dangers of crystal meth. I had written an article on the subject for the New York Times and received responses from thousands of people all over America with their stories of going through hell.

"There is a real hunger for information out there. Readers need to understand that addiction is a form of mental illness that needs to be treated by professional addictions specialists rather than in treatment centres that emphasize morality and prayers."

At the same time that David's book came out, Nic's own recollection of what it's like to be a drug addict was released under the title Tweak.

"Nic's memoirs have helped parents who have read it to understand what their children are going through," David says. "It helps bring families together again."

Last year, both father and son published second books on the subject of drug addiction. David's new work is Clean: Overcoming Addiction and Ending America's Greatest Tragedy, while Nic wrote We All Fall Down, which tells readers that getting better is a struggle, that cravings and insecurity don't disappear overnight and that setbacks are no reason to give up.

David says Nic, 31, is now married and living in Los Angeles. He has just published a book of fiction and is doing some writing for television.

"Nic's ordeal brought us all closer together as a family," David says. (He and his wife have two younger children, Jasper, 20, and Daisy, 17.)

David says he and Nic are looking forward to speaking in Winnipeg. "Strong Jewish communities like Winnipeg's provide solid support for addicts trying to recover," he says.

As a first step in that direction, Ontario Conservative MP Scott Reid moved the report in the House of Commons on March 4, calling the Jewish refugee history a "great human tragedy."

"These refugees were driven from their homes," Reid said, "often at risk to their lives, and almost always with complete loss of property and the destruction of communities that had existed, in some case for two millennia."

He said the government would only accept concurrence by Parliament on the report in its entirety, referring to the NDP's dissension from the recommendation to include the plight of Jewish refugees in peace talks.

NDP MP Nathan Cullen of British Columbia responded to Reid, but without any direct reference to the report.

Sylvain Abitbol, co-president of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), which also testified before the committee in May, hailed Canada for taking the lead on this issue.

"For those of us who were personally impacted by the Jewish exodus from Arab countries, it is a matter of justice that any future peace accord acknowledges this painful, and widely neglected, chapter of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

He said that "despite its tolerant attitude," only 3,000 Jews remain in his native Morocco today out of a community of about 265,000 in 1948.

Stan Urman, executive vice-president of the U.S.-based JJAC, told the committee the estimated value of the lost assets of Jewish refugees is $6 billion.

While agreeing that Jews had suffered at the hands of Middle Eastern and North African governments during the 20th century, especially during 1948-49 and 1967, the committee, in its 17-page report, "underline[d] its belief that recognition of the experiences of Jewish refugees does not diminish or compete with the situation of Palestinian refugees."

New self-advocacy group holds first meeting

Jews with intellectual disabilities speak out

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to the CJN

A new Jewish self-advocacy group for people with intellectual disabilities held its first meeting on Feb. 16 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Following the model of other self-advocacy groups, including non-Jewish groups in Canada, the new group will include a non-disabled "enabler" to help those with intellectual disabilities speak out for themselves.

Members of the group were addressed by U.S. disability-rights lawyer and professor Richard Bernstein, who has been legally blind since birth and has campaigned for years towards awareness and acceptance for the rights of all individuals.

The enabler is "helpful if they need help accessing resources, or anything too complicated," says Galya Ouanounou, on leave from JVS Toronto, who has 25 years of experience in special needs, both with JVS and with Yachad, part of the U.S.-based Orthodox Union.

One participant, Rachel Cohen, 31, has Asperger's syndrome, which makes socializing and employment difficult – and going to shul impossible.

"It's too stressful for me to go on my own," Cohen says. "If I had somebody in the community that I could go with, I'd be going to shul more often."

The term intellectual disability includes autism-spectrum disorders such as Asperger's, along with Down syndrome, and others.

It replaces older terms like "mental retardation" and "mental handicap," and helps differentiate these conditions from mental illnesses like schizophrenia or depression, said Ouanounou.

Intellectual disability has little to do with IQ – a person with an intellectual disability may have a high, low or average IQ, and a person with a low IQ may not have an intellectual disability, she said.

The goal isn't to stir up trouble, or to sit around and kvetch, Ouanounou emphasizes. "Self advocacy isn't going to tackle every issue that exists."

The flyer for the Feb. 16 event invited participants to "explore your goals."

Ouanounou says it was an open invitation to "talk about what your life is like," rather than to air a laundry list of complaints.

For one thing, Cohen points out, everybody's needs will be different. "Someone with Down syndrome might have different needs from someone with autism or cerebral palsy. You can't just say … 'someone with a disability' and treat everyone the same."

Ouanounou agrees. Whether it's the chance to take a trip, find employment or volunteer in a field of interest, or develop relationships with the opposite sex, she hopes the group will offer a "window to realize what else is out there."

Expanding horizons can be tremendously exciting, she said. "People may be living in a group home… they've been in a supported workshop, doing the same kind of thing for 20 years or more," says Ouanounou. "They're not using their potential. They might not even know what they want to do with their life."

Following Bernstein's talk, he took questions about disability rights from participants, including one young lawyer with cerebral palsy who asked if he should mention his disability when applying for a job. Bernstein suggested he use his disability as a bonus, proclaiming "look what I've overcome, I've been to law school, I can overcome obstacles."

Ouanounou said, "people don't always think about using disability as a plus."

She plans to continue with regular meetings, a Facebook page, finding funding sources and building connections within the community. The group has already been endorsed by four local organizations: JVS Toronto, DANI, Yachad and Zareinu.

Cohen sees the group as an opportunity "to make suggestions for programs you might want to see. Or, if there's something that is not fair, to speak up against it, and get things that you dreamed of coming true to come true."

To the entire community, Ouanounou suggests embracing individuals with disabilities in any way we can. "Don't worry if you feel uncomfortable. Treat them as you would with anyone else, and you'll get to see the person for who they are. They are just so happy to be welcomed with a smile. That's what the Jewish community is about – reaching out to one another."

Wine can help bridge cultures

All those celebrating Purim are familiar with the story of the Persians (modern day Iran) who tried to destroy the Jewish People. Providing a twist on the traditional tale, Rachel Stern Siegman investigates how wine once united ancient Iran and Israel, and gives suggestions as to how your wine choice can reflect these ancient vino-loving cultures.

Rachel Stern Siegman
Special to The CJN

It has long been said that the earliest origins of wine date back to the Middle East. As the legend goes, a Persian princess who was part of the king's harem was depressed after losing favour with the king. As her depression culminated she desired to take her own life, and went out to the garden in search of the means. Blue cracked berries caught her eye and she quickly snatched up a fistful of what she believed to be poisonous fruit. As luck would have it, these blue cracked berries were really fermented grapes, and rather than take her life, they lifted the princess' depression. Once in better spirits she gained favour with the king, and the widespread fermentation of wine began.

Persia began to expand its wine- making abilities, cultivating the popular Syrah, otherwise known as Shiraz, grapes that were likely named after the Persian city of Shiraz. Over the border, ancient Canaan, or modern day Israel, too began to reap the benefits of its superior winemaking abilities.

Many believe that Chardonnay originated in Israel before making its way to Europe. In the midst of his departure back to Europe, a crusader noticed an interesting vine, and jumped off his horse to snatch it. Upon return home, the grapes were termed "Sha'ar Adoni", Gate of God, after the land in which the vine was first spotted. Due to common vernacular, Sha'ar Adoni became "Chardonnay."

Winemaking flourished in the Second Temple period and the historian Josephus Flavius wrote of the Galilee, in the north, as producing "fruits in a wondrous manner." He described the vine and the fig as "the kings of all the fruit trees" and to this day, archeological ruins of wine presses are found scattered across northern Israel, the country's winemaking capital.

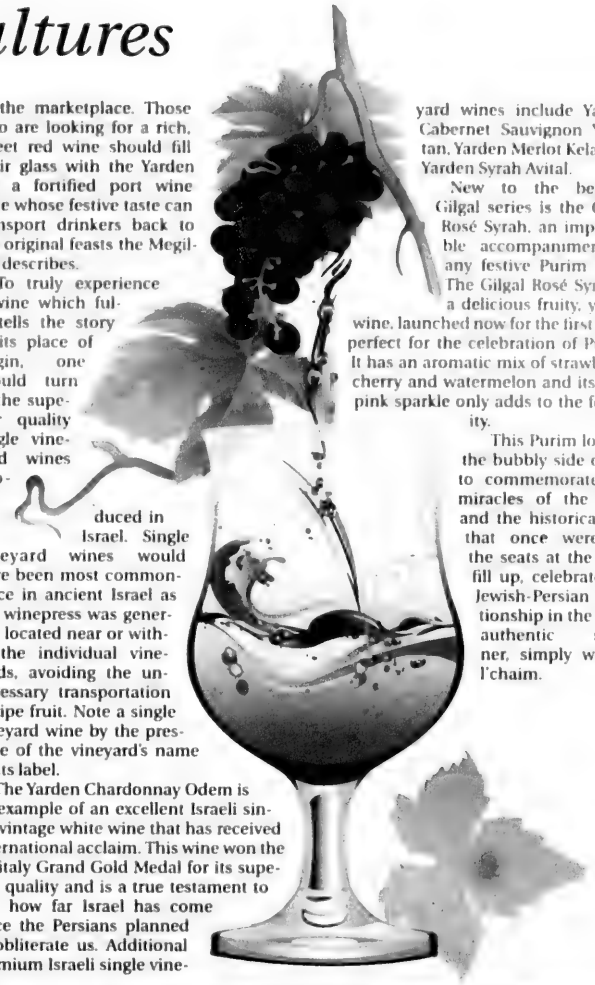
Up a camel-shaped cliff nestled in the hills of the Golan Heights lie ruins of the city of Gamla. This ancient town was a Jewish cosmopolitan hub, particularly famous for its lush vineyards. The wine and olive oil presses of this once thriving city can still be explored today.

During the rule of the Ottoman Empire, all winemaking in the reigning areas was strictly abolished and vineyards were utterly destroyed. Therefore, despite the fact that many wine varieties may have originated in Middle Eastern states, such as Iran and Israel, every contemporary Israeli winery had to begin the entire process of winemaking, including cultivating the land, anew.

With the resurrection of Israel's flourishing wine industry, this Purim it is possible to return to wine's ancient Middle Eastern roots. The Megillah describes Achashverosh's boisterous, lavish feasts in great detail, and our sages teach us that the Persian king drank out of vessels brought from Israel. Celebrate this year like the kings of yore by choosing wines from the ancient wine region, Israel.

Persians and Canaanites were known to have favoured sweet wines. One such wine, Yarden Muscat, whose grapes are grown in the southern heights of the Golan region, is considered to be one of the most popular and beloved sweet wines in the marketplace. Those who are looking for a rich, sweet red wine should fill their glass with the Yarden T2, a fortified port wine style whose festive taste can transport drinkers back to the original feasts the Megillah describes.

To truly experience a wine which fully tells the story of its place of origin, one should turn to the superior quality single vineyard wines produced in Israel. Single vineyard wines would have been most commonplace in ancient Israel as the winepress was generally located near or within the individual vineyards, avoiding the unnecessary transportation of ripe fruit. Note a single vineyard wine by the presence of the vineyard's name on its label.



The Yarden Chardonnay Odem is an example of an excellent Israeli single vintage white wine that has received international acclaim. This wine won the Vinitaly Grand Gold Medal for its superior quality and is a true testament to just how far Israel has come since the Persians planned to obliterate us. Additional premium Israeli single vineyard wines include Yarden Cabernet Sauvignon Yonatan, Yarden Merlot Kela, and Yarden Syrah Avital.

New to the beloved Gilgal series is the Gilgal Rosé Syrah, an impeccable accompaniment to any festive Purim feast. The Gilgal Rosé Syrah is a delicious fruity, young wine, launched now for the first time, perfect for the celebration of Purim. It has an aromatic mix of strawberry, cherry and watermelon and its light pink sparkle only adds to the festivity.

This Purim look to the bubbly side of life to commemorate the miracles of the time and the historical ties that once were. As the seats at the feast fill up, celebrate the Jewish-Persian relationship in the most authentic manner, simply with a l'chaim.

King Achashverosh

Just in time for Purim, we talk to the ruler

KopShtick
Special to The CJN

In honour of Purim, The CJN spared no expense, rented a time machine and travelled thousands of years back to historic Shushan, Persia, to get this exclusive interview with King Achashverosh. Amazingly, everything he said was word for word what another famous leader of ours has said a lot more recently.

Your Highness, thank you so much for allowing us to meet you here. We hope it's not too difficult.
Absolutely not.

Well, there was the last time that our reporters came to your castle and tried to get a word in with you.
Hey, I don't go to your front door, don't go to my front door!

But they were there to ask you about recent allegations.
Bunch of maggots… Sorry maybe I shouldn't have said that.

So, let us put you on the spot, then. Is it true, did you have your wife, Vashti, killed?
Probably in one of my drunken stupors.

And you decided to marry anew. How were you able to alleviate your new wives' concerns that you may kill them too?
Women love money. You give them a couple thousand bucks and they're happy.

Reports are coming in that you've married every girl there is, leaving no girl for anyone else!
It's just lies after lies and lies. And I've called you pathological liars, and you are, so why don't you take me to court?

You own the courts, Sire.
I am a role model!

So, is it not true you married everything not nailed to the ground?
Contrary to what many people said, I am not married to a casino.

And you've recently appointed the evil Haman as your viceroy.
I am taking accountability and receiving advice from people with expertise. I am accepting responsibility for the challenges I face.

But he wants to kill all the Jews.
It's a great day for democracy.

How do you think your Jewish constituents feel about the promotion. You just had them at your recent party.
I'm not conceited, but I had sort of a rock star status there.

One of your new wives is rumoured to have a campaign to get Haman's decrees about the Jewish People retracted.
That's very sad that she's a racist.

You do recall that it was a Jew, Mordechai, who saved you from a plot on your life. How did you feel knowing that your most loyal servants wanted you gone?
That hurt, man. When it hits you in the face, you don't expect it, right?

Absolutely, so you must have had a lot of appreciation for his rescue.
He's a great guy.

You had so much appreciation for him that you threw a parade honouring him. Why weren't you in attendance?
I was at my cottage in Muskoka.

Well, we have pictures from the event if you want to see.
This looks like all girlie stuff.

Our apologies. And I don't want to keep you from this lovely party Esther has invited you and Haman to. The steaks look a bit too juicy, though.
We're going to put an end to this gravy train.

Good idea. How do you feel about your queen inviting not just you, but Haman as well to this party?
He's a friend, he's a good guy, I don't throw my friends under the bus.

But there he is on a couch with Esther now!
I'm very surprised!

So are we.
I'll make sure that [guy]'s dead. I'm going to kill that %$#? guy. I'm telling you it's first-degree murder. He dies or I die, brother.

Wow, your Highness, such a drastic change.
When he's down, I'll rip his #$%# throat out!

Well, don't let us get in your way. But what about those harsh decrees about the Jewish People?
I sincerely, sincerely, sincerely apologize.

No problem. Wow, this has been quite an interview. Here, have a cookie.
I have more than enough to eat at home, thank you very much.

No problem, just thought we'd offer.

History will vindicate him

David Levine
Special to The CJN

Even as the evolution of communications technology continues to destabilize and redefine the geopolitical landscape, we still find ourselves shocked, from time to time, as the institutions that form our social bedrock are suddenly, violently uprooted.

I refer, of course, to this very newspaper, and the recent change of leadership it has undergone, in the person of Yoni Goldstein.

I have known Goldstein since his adolescent days – when he was a carefree young Marxist, idly dreaming of subverting a national Jewish publication to re-educate the population to his will and whim.

Those dreams would not stay idle for long.

At 16, after seizing control of our high school paper in a bloodless coup, Goldstein rededicated the publication to Noam Chomsky, Edward Said, and unyielding criticism of the State of Israel. One early article bearing Goldstein's byline even described the political situation there as "complex". Goldstein has repeatedly apologized, calling the piece "a youthful indiscretion" – but his true stripes were revealed, and they remain visible to this day.

Now, through a series of deceptions so complex it makes House of Cards look like a game of tag, his boyhood dreams have come to fruition: Yoni "Che" Goldstein (he insists on the nickname) now helms our dearest ship, his eyes firmly affixed on the rocks.

What Goldstein fails to realize is that this hallowed weekly is more than just a newspaper – it is a blunt instrument, to be wielded in defence of our community. While our new editor-in-chief is preoccupied befriending J Street and Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, who will protect our interests? Who will warn us of resurgent anti-Semitism? Who will feature pictures of our grandchildren at a food drive?

I am not prone to overstatement or overreaction – it is my careful, reasoned opinion that this newspaper's recent subversion is a threat more dangerous than Iran's nuclear program. The transfer of The Canadian Jewish News into the hands of a communist vegan hipster like Goldstein is an affront to the morals, values, ethics, beliefs, principles – and, most importantly, the midot of our community.

In Pirkei Avot, our sages tell us to judge each man leniently. Clearly, our sages never met Yoni Goldstein. I call on the leaders of our community to take a stand – intervene editorially in the workings of The Canadian Jewish News, boycott all news journalism in protest, and declare a cherem on the elitist few who wish to broaden our horizons so excessively.

Some people will reject my theories as paranoid, closed-minded, or neo-McCarthyist – but anyone who says so is a self-hating Jew.

TEMPLE Emanu-El

Director of Centre for Jewish Living and Learning
Temple Emanu-El, Toronto, ON, Canada

We are a Reform-affiliated congregation in Toronto, at a stage in our synagogue life in which we are energized by and dedicated to educational transformation and renewal. Our goal is to inspire our youth to become engaged liberal Jews.

We are seeking a progressive educator able to foster a holistic Jewish learning experience for our families within the context of our religious school.

The Director of Jewish Living and Learning will possess an imaginative view of the possibilities of Jewish pedagogy. Integral to this vision will be the exploration of alternative learning, family education, parallel parent/child learning and informal learning experiences. The successful applicant will have significant experience in education and leadership, will be passionate about Israel and will have a vision for Jewish learning. Fluency in Modern Hebrew is highly valued, as is a background in the youth movement.

The Director's role includes oversight of our one day/week Religious school, midweek Hebrew program, and family holiday and Shabbat programming, corresponding to approximately 25 hours/week. Our Bnei Mitzvah Coordinator and our Teen Engagement Coordinator report to the Director. The hours are flexible. Salary will be commensurate with experience and qualifications.

Interested candidates should submit a letter of interest, resume and two references to DirectorSearch@templeemanuel.ca. We will begin reviewing applications on March 25, 2014, and will consider candidates till the position is filled. For further information please contact Rabbi Debra Landsberg-Hirschy at Rabbi@templeemanuel.ca

Personal Purims

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

What does the story of Purim have in common with a woman driving the wrong way on a freeway, a man trying to flee Iran in 1979 and an allegedly poisonous batch of plum jam? More than you'd think. Improbably, these near tragedies all ended safely. But rather than just breathe a sigh of relief, each of the people involved declared a "personal" Purim to acknowledge their own miracle, similar to the hidden one that saved the Jewish people in the time of Esther and Mordechai.

How do you commemorate a personal Purim? Rabbi Daniel Yaakov Travis explains that a thanksgiving feast is appropriate and that the day acquires the status of Purim for the survivor and his descendants. This tradition hits home for the rabbi. Years ago, while on the way to buy food in honour of his newborn daughter, he was involved in what appeared to be a fatal car accident. "HaShem had other plans for me and, in an act of infinite kindness, He graciously spared my life. Chai Sivan (the 18th day of Sivan), the day that I was saved, became a personal yom tov for me and my family." [bit.ly/personalpurim3]

Back in 1731, David Brandeis, a Jewish grocer from Bohemia, was imprisoned along with his family for selling some plum jam (povidl) blamed for causing the death of a gentile. An investigation revealed tuberculosis was the culprit and the Jews were released. Descendants of Brandeis celebrate Purim Povidl on the 10th of Adar. [http://bit.ly/personalpurim1]

Rabbi Barry Leff's personal Purim occurred not too far from Haman territory. On Feb. 16, 1979, Rabbi Leff was trying to flee Tehran just after the fall of the shah. "One of the Revolutionary Guards in the lead car was riding on the trunk, on the outside of the car. The car hit a little dip, and his gun went off, shooting out the back window of the car." You can read the rest of his journey to freedom on Rabbi Leff's blog. [bit.ly/personalpurim2]

Sonia Levitin found herself travelling in the wrong direction as cars barrelled at her on Los Angeles' 405 Freeway. When she survived, she realized something inexplicable had occurred. She was also determined to prevent those feelings of gratitude from wearing off, as typically happens. Once a year Levitin holds a celebratory dinner for eight to 10 friends. She cooks everything herself, uses the best china and invites guests to share their own moments of gratitude. She calls it "the Freeway Purim." [bit.ly/personalpurim4]

In his Personal Purim Miracle, Rabbi Benjamin Blech writes how his appearance in a stranger's home set off an improbable chain of events that helped prevent someone from forsaking Judaism. But Rabbi Blech doesn't take any credit

"I was just a prop used in a larger, cosmic drama." [bit.ly/personalpurim5] "Ever since then, I've become attuned to noticing the small miracles that surround us so often in life. They're the ones that should make us reflect on why we happened to be precisely in a certain place at precisely a certain time. They're the ones that should remind us that there are occasions when we are merely messengers in a divinely orchestrated story, witnessing God's hidden miracles."

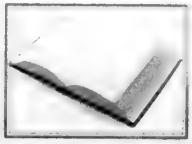
The lesson of Purim

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath



Rabbinic Reflections

This Saturday night and Sunday, March 15 and 16, we will celebrate the Jewish holiday of Purim. Who could not love Purim?

Masquerading in costumes, swinging noisy greggers and having an excuse to eat, drink and be merry makes for one great holiday. However, the story of Purim is a story of Jewish survival and perseverance in the face of the threat of annihilation.

When Mordechai heard about Haman's decree to totally annihilate the Jewish People, he donned sackcloth and ashes, the clothing of mourning. Then he gathered 22,000 Jewish children and began to teach them Torah, imbuing them with a renewed love for our heritage. He implanted within their hearts such a burning self-sacrifice that they all declared that they would remain with Mordechai and Torah, for life. The heartrending, sincere pleas for salvation of these Jewish children penetrated the heavenly gates. Thus, the evil decree was annulled and the miracle of Purim evolved.

Today, we ought to be inspired by Mordechai's example and realize the supreme importance of educating our young. A lofty position, a life heavily burdened with awesome responsibilities, or a hectic schedule doesn't make it easy for us to devote at least part of our time and energy to teaching Torah and transmitting our heritage to the next generation. Yet, it is our sacred duty to inspire all Jewish children with a love and awe of God.

On a deeper level, there is actually a profound idea "hidden" behind the masks we wear on Purim. Our masquerading commemorates the fact that the miracle of Purim was not blatant, but rather hidden and masqueraded in natural events. Purim wasn't like the miracle of Chanukah, where a supernatural thing happened – a small cruse of oil lasted for eight days. Nobody would mistake that for a natural occurrence.

But on Purim, nothing wacky took place. Esther became queen, she had access to the king, Mordechai happened to overhear the plot of the two guys who wanted to kill the king, he went to her, etc. All these events could be misinterpreted as natural events, "coincidence," if you will. Of course, they were all orchestrated by God to save the Jews – but it wasn't in your face. He was working things out behind the scenes.

Queen Esther's role in the story of Purim also highlights this idea of "hidden," while showing the incredible power and strength of the Jewish woman. Even the name Esther comes from the Hebrew word hester, which means hidden. She was reserved, modest, quiet and humble, but she was the true heroine in this story. It was she who put the plan in motion and who influenced the king to annul Haman's decree to annihilate the Jewish people. By keeping her identity hidden until the perfect time to reveal herself, Esther saved the Jewish People.

Purim is the story of all mankind and, more specifically, the story of the Jewish nation. History repeats itself, and we must therefore take a lesson from the past as a means of dealing with the present. We must learn from Mordechai that the way to destroy the "Hamans" of today and bring light and joy to our people is by gathering the Jewish children and teaching them Torah and the eternal values of our people.

Tikkun olam soars

From the Reut Institute
Michal Kabatznik

The concept of tikkun olam (repairing the world) has been one of the foundations of Judaism since the days of the Mishnah. We are taught that it is our responsibility to look out for those less fortunate than us in our communities and around the world.

Jewish communities worldwide operate service projects in their communities, while, at the same time, international Jewish organizations operate in poor and developing countries in an effort to improve the world's most impoverished populations.

Since the establishment of the State of Israel, the government has taken its tikkun olam responsibilities very seriously. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Agency for International Development Co-operation, MASHAV, works to co-ordinate and implement the country's development programs. Since the 1950s, Israel has operated programs and provided training in more than 132 countries, and many Israeli technologies, including water and agriculture innovations, have been implemented in developing nations through MASHAV.

In addition to the government's work, many Israeli non-governmental humanitarian and development organizations operate around the world in the aftermath of natural disasters. Groups like IsraAID set up aid operations in Haiti and Japan to help rehabilitate those countries after the devastating earthquakes. In the years since the natural disasters, the organizations have shifted from post-disaster aid to development work that's helping to change the country from the ground up.

On the global level, the United Nations launched the Millennium Goals in 2000 and created a blueprint that has set the tone for the improvement of conditions for the world's most underprivileged populations. The eight millennium goals cover a wide array of topics from extreme poverty (individuals who live on less than $1.25 a day) to halting the spread of HIV/AIDS and providing universal primary education, all by the target date of 2015. Following the tone of the UN's goals, aid organizations, non-profit groups, and governments from developed nations around the world have turned their attention to the least fortunate and begun to focus on these nations.

Beyond governments and non-profits, businesses and corporations around the world are also turning their attention to the developing world. New ways of thinking are paving the way for the developing world to have access to products adapted to their unique circumstances and available at relevant price points.

By approaching the populations of the developing world as new consumers, companies around the world are designing products and solutions aimed at consumers in these countries, a step that ensures revenue while, at the same time, improving the lives of millions living in extreme poverty.

In Israel, groups like IsraelDev are working to harness the ingenuity of the startup nation by encouraging Israeli companies and entrepreneurs to focus on and work with the developing world.

In the global interconnected world we live in today, more attention than ever before is being paid to the most underprivileged populations by governments, non-profit organizations and businesses. By working across industries toward a shared goal, we have a real chance to improve the lives of the world's poorest populations, to truly make an impact that will embody tikkun olam.

Weights or wings?

From the Bimah
Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

A phrase that always irks me is "the constraints of Halachah." It appears in writing and in public presentations given by rabbis and teachers in North America and in Israel, and whenever I hear it (OK, I may be a little thin-skinned), I feel that it tells me all I need to know about the attitudes of the speaker or writer.

Whether talking about innovations in prayer or other areas of Jewish life, the speakers will try to have it both ways –modern and traditional – by saying they are doing all they can, or as much as can be hoped for "within the constraints of Halachah." (To me, use of the phrase usually indicates someone who is pushing the envelope just beyond the parameters of halachic norms, but that's just my as-yet untested theory.)

The use of this phrase gets under my skin so much because the not-too-subtle subtext is that Jewish law and tradition are a confining and limiting set of rules and regulations which effectively hold us back from self-fulfilment and realization of our best selves. This is a tremendous error in perspective.

Imagine a musician in the Toronto Symphony Orchestra feeling "constrained" by the notes of Mozart or Beethoven. Imagine a pharmacist "constrained" by the rules, regulations and standards of the Ontario College of Pharmacists, or by what he or she learned in the course of professional training. The standards, guidelines and "canonical" texts of those fields are not "constraints" at all, but rather the template against which the craft is practised, out of which excellent and completeness grow.

Jewish law and custom are not "constraints" that hold us back from doing what we want to do; they are the warp and weft of the tapestry of our lives, the notes of the music we make with our daily existence, the tools and the techniques for elevating the mundane to the holy.

When I hear how people struggle against the "constraints of Halachah," I imagine (Purim Torah alert!) that we, as a community, would have something like that of the Amish of Lancaster County, Penn., my hometown, who release their teenagers from community norms and standards for a period of time, called rumspringa, to allow them to walk on the wild side and decide on their own whether to return to the community and accept its norms and customs for life. Some 95 per cent of teens do accept it and return, even though they have tasted life outside the community. (I'd hope we'd call it "frumspringa.")

Framing the depth and majesty of Torah as an onerous burden is really a self-fulfilling prophecy. I would rather see it as 613 opportunities to connect to the Divine, to maximize the potential for holiness in whatever situation I encounter. Grander than any musical composition, more life-giving than any medicine, Torah opens doors onto palaces for us. It invites us to grow even as it challenges us.

When we find a disconnect between Torah and our values or habits, let's see it as a moment of humility and growth, rather than a confining straitjacket. Rather than weights around our ankles, let us rather see mitzvot as the wings and the wind at our back.

Jewish MP in Ukraine addresses issue while in Jerusalem

Israel's silence on Crimea slammed

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel isn't doing enough in word or deed to help the Jewish residents of Ukraine during the current crisis occurring in their country, a Ukrainian member of parliament and senior member of the local community charged Sunday in Jerusalem.

"We did expect a clearer stance on everything that's going on. There are 400,000 Jewish citizens in Ukraine, and we did expect a little bit more of Israel," said Oleksandr Feldman, a lawmaker in Kiev since 2002.

"I'm a bit disappointed by [Foreign Minister Avigdor] Liberman," he added, referring to a rather toothless statement the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem released March 5, reportedly after American pressure.

"Israel is following with great concern the events in Ukraine, is anxious for peace for all its citizens, and hopes that the situation will not escalate to a loss of human life. Israel hopes the crisis in Ukraine will be handled through diplomatic means and will be resolved peacefully," the ministry's statement read in full.

Feldman, a member of the centrist Party of Regions since 2011, said that no meetings with senior government officials have been arranged for him during his present visit to Israel. During his last trip to Israel, about two months ago, he met with Liberman and Deputy Foreign Minister Ze'ev Elkin, he said, and "appealed to the Israeli government to take a clear stance on what's happening in the Ukraine."

At the time, pro-European demonstrators were taking to the streets across Ukraine, protesting the government's decision to forgo rapprochement with the European Union in favour of closer ties with Moscow. Russian troops had not yet invaded the Crimean peninsula.

Oleksandr Feldman

Eduard Dolinsky, director general of the Kiev-based Ukrainian Jewish Committee, who was accompanying Feldman on his Israel trip, also criticized the government for its bland statement regarding the present standoff between Ukraine and Russia.

"As the Jewish community of Ukraine, we are very frustrated by the reaction of the Israeli government on the current crisis," Dolinsky said at a press conference with Feldman, organized by the Jerusalem Press Club.

"It is so soft that I didn't even understand what they are talking about. This is such diplomatic language, it is simply disappearing in words." He urged the Israeli government to issue a "clear statement of support for people who are struggling for their freedom, strong support for a country that is struggling for its sovereignty and independence."

The kippah-wearing Feldman, who has served as the Ukrainian Jewish Committee's president since 2008, said the Israeli government "could do much, much more" to assist Ukrainian Jewry and to fight anti-Semitism. For instance, he said, nine Ukrainian citizens who were injured during the violent protests in Kiev's Maidan Square had been flown to Israel for medical treatment but had not received any additional financial support.

"It is not a lot of money. Israel could afford to make a humanitarian act out of that," said Feldman, speaking in Russian through an interpreter.

"People from all parts of Ukraine asked us, shall we stay [in Ukraine] or shall we [leave, for fear of violence], and all these questions could have been prevented if Israel had taken a clear stance on what's happening in Ukraine," Feldman said. "Everything we do in Ukraine we always present as a joint venture with Israel."

Dolinsky said that so far, the Jewish Agency has only provided $5,000 to the Jewish communities of the Crimea region "to help with security." But a few weeks ago, during the Ukrainian Jewish Committee's last visit to Israel, it had asked the Israeli government to send to Ukraine a team of Israeli security professionals, which would "inspect the situation, with the community infrastructure — first of all synagogues and Jewish schools — and come up with a plan what we can do about security," he said. "This request has not yet been implemented," he said.

Group sets up stand before International Women's Day

Women of the Wall take on tfillin

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV — They were standing in a public square in a major Israeli city, helping women lay tfillin amid shouts of protest and quizzical looks from nearby men in black hats.

It's become an occasional morning routine for Women of the Wall. Except this time, they weren't at the Western Wall in Jerusalem. They were at the entrance to Shuk Hacarmel, the boisterous central market in Tel Aviv.

The women's prayer group achieved something of a coup this year when a district court legalized their monthly services at the Western Wall, effectively ending years of periodic arrests and detentions of its members.

Women of the Wall isn't allowed to bring a Torah into the Kotel's women's section, and it's still negotiating with the government over the expansion of a pluralistic prayer site at the Robinson's Arch section of the wall. But the court ruling and ensuing police protection have allowed the group to pray in relative peace in recent months, without fear of prison or counter-protest.

So, in advance of International Women's Day on March 8, the group came to Tel Aviv the morning of March 7 and set up a small stand at Star of David Square, so named because crowded, noisy streets shoot out of it in six directions.

Then they started asking women if they wanted to put on tallit and tfillin. Most ignored the offer or politely refused, but a handful said yes to one or the other, repeating the blessing word for word along with a Women of the Wall member.

Men who walk through the square get the same offer every day from Chabad Chassidim. But when the women started wrapping willing passersby in a tallit, though, it elicited an outcry. U.S. Orthodox day schools such as SAR Academy and Ramaz in New York may allow women to don prayer shawls and leather straps, but at least some Israelis apparently think the same behaviour should not take place in the streets of Tel Aviv.

A crowd formed as one young man in a white shirt and large, black, knit kippah began to scream.

"Really? What else do you want to do? Have a circumcision?" he yelled before two friends pulled him away. "Maybe you'll do that one day."

By the time the women were ready to close up, the Chabad tables had opened, flanking Women of the Wall's booth on either side. Each side, for the most part, left the other alone, but perhaps the Chabadniks were a bit jealous. Never in recent memory had a tfillin table in central Tel Aviv gotten so much attention.

Autism specialists meet in Jerusalem

Jennifer Tzivia MacLeod
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM — Researchers and others involved with autism found many commonalities at the three-day Canada-Israel Autism Spectrum Disorder (ASD) Symposium this month at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem while addressing challenges such as geography, ethnicity and autism as a lifelong condition.

The three-day symposium, from March 2 to 4, was sponsored by organizations from both countries: Hebrew U along with its Institutes for Advanced Studies (IAS) and Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC), Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU), the Ontario Brain Institute and NeuroDevNet, a Canadian network of Centres of Excellence.

It was a long time in the making, according to Toronto mother Connie Putterman, one of four organizers. Putterman and her husband, David Golden, among the few lay participants, were drawn into the complex world of autism research in 2000, when their 17-month-old son Ely was diagnosed with autism.

With little information available to parents at the time, Putterman said, clinical research projects gave them access to "the best minds" but also let them participate in the process, continually re-evaluating their son. "It was a big teaching tool… to be more observant, to describe our observations and articulate them."

Putterman, a member of CFHU's Toronto chapter, told The CJN how meaningful the symposium was to her. "Growing up as a Diaspora Jew… I'd dream about Israel and its survival." Supporting Israel is not only about giving money but "about building relationships… teaching each other about the best ways of doing things." While in Israel, Putterman and Golden took a day off to run the Tel Aviv half-marathon to raise funds and awareness for autism research.

The first two days of the symposium were open to professionals only, with presentations on genetics, prenatal development, diagnosis and epidemiology. Canadian organizations from coast to coast were represented, including Toronto's Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH), the Hospital for Sick Children, McGill University, the University of Manitoba, the University of British Columbia, Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital in Toronto, and Queen's University.

On its final day, the symposium was opened to the public, and its focus shifted to explore the effects of autism on families and communities, including sessions on early diagnosis, services in Israel and Canada, and new treatments.

The day began with a talk by Lihi Lapid, wife of Israeli Finance Minister Yair Lapid and the mother of a 17-year-old girl with autism.

At first, Lapid said, she thought her daughter had a hearing problem. "They realize there's a problem. They give us an appointment for another checkup… I realize it's maybe not only the ears. I pray, 'Please give me a deaf child.' All the other possibilities, I realize, are much worse."

Lonnie Zweigenbaum and Connie Putterman, are running the Tel Aviv half-marathon for autism awareness and research.

Lapid acknowledged the importance of research and medical treatment, but said she herself was now focused on finding balance and happiness within her own family, a theme also addressed by Putterman, who said, "Hold on to those high expectations… If you keep raising them, they'll keep meeting them… Your child will rise to them in their own way, whatever their capacity is."

Presentations explored accomplishments and challenges in both countries.

"We've come a long way, but there's still a lot of gaps," said Wendy Roberts of Sick Kids in Toronto.

In Ontario, services for children with autism are often provided in "blocks" of six to eight weeks, followed by months of no treatment. Regular, consistent treatment would probably result in better outcomes for children and families.

Several participants spoke about dealing with autism throughout an individual's entire lifespan. Roberts told The CJN that despite some negative developments in Canada – like Ontario's denial of services to autistic adults with normal IQs – she's hopeful that things will change soon.

Last week, the federal government allocated $20 million toward autism, of which Roberts hopes much will go toward helping autistic adults transition from school to university and later into meaningful, paid employment. "We need to get a whole lot better at developing those services."

The biggest issue in diagnosis and treatment is probably money, despite the fact that autism may be disproportionately well funded compared to other conditions. Conference chair Asher Ornoy of Hebrew U said Israel may spend more than $500,000 for a child diagnosed with autism before the age of 18, compared to under $300,000 for kids with other neurological disorders.

Offering services outside of major centres is a problem for both countries. In Canada, given geographical distances, rural family doctors may not see many patients with autism or be up to date on the latest research and options. Israel, too, has fewer services available outside major cities, Ornoy said.

In some provinces, Roberts said, parents with an autistic child are given money annually to spend on services of their choice. This has spawned an industry of "people getting into the money-making business," including unethical service providers who may not be backed by a professional college.

Finally, ethnic diversity remains a hurdle, said co-organizer Lonnie Zwaigenbaum of the University of Alberta, who also ran the Tel Aviv half-marathon with Putterman and Golden.

Among native Canadians, for example and among Arabs in Israel, diagnosis and treatment may lag far behind. "It's a challenge to come up with culturally sensitive diagnostic measures and therapies."

In his wrap-up session, Zwaigenbaum said he was thrilled that participants had discovered "a real sense of the commonalities," and also by the emergence of "natural partnerships" between Canadians and Israelis working in similar areas.

Both countries are clearly moving in the right direction. As Zwaigenbaum told The CJN, "It's not just about treating the symptoms of a disorder… it's about helping an individual and their family find dignity and be part of society."

Israel will not evacuate settlements: Netanyahu

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government won't evacuate West Bank settlers from their homes in a peace deal with the Palestinians, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu said some West Bank Jewish settlements will remain outside of Israel's permanent borders under a peace agreement, but he won't force Jews to leave their homes.

"There won't be an evacuation. I don't intend to do this. I've said this," Netanyahu told Israel's Channel 2 on Friday night in his first interview with the Hebrew-speaking media in more than a year.

The Israeli leader said he would provide security to any Israelis living outside of the nation's borders.

Netanyahu said that under any peace agreement, the Palestinians would have to recognize Israel as a Jewish state. He said he did not believe the Palestinians were ready to sign a peace agreement.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"First let's see if they are even willing to negotiate. From what I see, they are very far from this," he said.

"They think they can continue with their acts of refusal – to go with demands to the United Nations and to distance themselves from the question of what their concessions are, how will they recognize a Jewish state."

He called his meeting last week in Washington with U.S. President Barack Obama "positive."

Obama is scheduled to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas next week.

Abbas told youth activists of his Fatah party March 7 that there is "no way" he will recognize Israel as a Jewish state, the Palestinian news agency Wafa reported.

Cooking school delivers family friendly recipes

As both an accomplished chef and busy mother of three, Carolyn Tanner-Cohen, owner of Delicious Dish Cooking School, incorporates her passion for family home cooking with healthy foods, along with nutritionally balanced cuisine.

Founded by Tanner-Cohen in 2002, Delicious Dish Cooking School offers lessons at her kitchen studio, and hosts private groups and one-on-one in-home culinary lessons.

Delicious Dish integrates both kosher and gluten-free options, and presents recipes and menu ideas for celebrating Jewish holidays.

"My maternal grandmother, who is 93, and all the women in my family are superb cooks. Each Passover, there would be a competition for the best honey cake, best Passover nut cake and best Passover gefilte fish," said Tanner-Cohen.

Delicious Dish shares a favourite kosher for Passover recipe with The CJN.

MIXED BEETS WITH MAROR VINAIGRETTE AND CHOPPED PISTACHIOS

1 bunch yellow beets
1 bunch red beets
1 heaping tbsp. chopped fresh flat leaf parsley
1 heaping tbsp. chopped fresh mint
1 heaping tbsp. chopped fresh chives
1/4 cup shelled pistachio nuts (roasted optional) coarsely chopped small piece fresh horseradish, peeled cracked black pepper coarse sea salt for sprinkling
1 tbsp. prepared white horseradish
1 clove garlic, minced
2 tbsp. finely chopped shallots
1 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. white wine vinegar
4 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil

Remove beets from the greens. Place unpeeled beets in a pot covered in cold water (cook the two different colour beets separately), bring to a boil, reduce the heat to a simmer and cook covered until the beets are fork tender. This can take 35-40 minutes. When cool enough to handle, peel (the skins will slip off). Cut each beet in half and then cut into 1/2-in. wedges. Set aside, keeping colours separate.

Make the dressing by combining the horseradish, garlic, shallots, honey, vinegar and olive oil. Can be done by hand, or in a blender or mini food processor. Set aside. (This step can be done several days ahead.)

Keeping the beets in separate bowls, toss with a few tbsp. of dressing.

Assemble the salad on the platter. Arrange both colour dressed beets on platter, sprinkle with herbs (parsley, mint and chives), sprinkle the pistachios around. Using a vegetable peeler, shave some fresh horseradish and then cut into thin strips. Sprinkle fresh horseradish pieces on the salad. Spoon more dressing over and around the salad, sprinkle freshly ground pepper and coarse sea salt.

Company helps adults with ADHD end the chaos

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Do any of these symptoms apply to you?

You find that your life is chaotic, unmanageable. You are easily sidetracked from the task you started on. You flit from job to job. You can't follow through on a project.

If so, chances are you're part of a fairly substantial segment of the population who have been diagnosed with ADHD, attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder.

Often associated with children who face learning challenges at school, adults experience the condition as well. Shanna Pearson, who was diagnosed with the disorder eight years ago, started a business one year later to help people cope with the condition.

Called One Focus Total Success, Pearson's company provides coaching assistance to people who want to get their lives under control. It does so by having its coaches direct clients to focus on one specific task at a time. With a coach on the phone, the chance of an ADHD sufferer procrastinating or getting sidetracked is reduced and the coach can verify through a number of means that the client is following through on the advice, she said.

Shanna Pearson

The advice is tailored to meet the needs of each client, Pearson continued. If a person is hamstrung by a messy, disorganized desk, the coach will give specific instructions on getting it cleaned up – not later, right now. Instructions will be given and the client is expected to photograph the desk, before and after, and email the images to the coach while they're still on the line.

That way, the client stays on task and implements the very practical advice they receive. "That's what we do that people love us for," she said.

If cleaning a garage is a problem, the instructor helps create a system for storing, and monitors its implementation. It could be storing like objects together, or perhaps – especially for women – keeping things together that share the same colour.

"The system has to be easy for the client to implement. Everything is simplicity," Pearson said.

For people with ADHD, getting organized can be a problem, Pearson continued. Prioritizing is an important element in that clients are advised to schedule their most important tasks at the time of the day they're most productive; save less important jobs, like checking email, for less productive times of the day, she advises.

"We're teaching them how to create a system and to implement the system," she explained.

Clients are billed at a rate of $99-$149 per week. They receive one coaching session per week, along with a follow-up text message or email.

Most clients stay with One Focus for six months. They pay by the month, and they're able to cancel at any time.

Coaches, who are mostly based in the United States, receive one-third of the fee. Of the company's 22 coaches, only one is from the Toronto area.

At any current time, One Focus has more than 400 clients and that number is doubling every year, Pearson said.

Surprisingly, only a small percentage of clients are Canadian. Like the coaches, many are American, but One Focus has clients across the world.

"The hardest part of the business is hiring people," Pearson said. "These people have to be the best coaches on the planet. They need to be motivational, quite good at prioritization and they have to go deep into people, who've been living lives with ADHD."

Coaches have to really understand their clients, who often "have issues of commitment. A lot get overwhelmed by the magnitude of the task and they become paralyzed and go do something else."

Most of her staff are counsellors, psychologists, social workers or teachers. Surprisingly, she's had no success recruiting personnel from a U.S. school that specifically trains ADHD counsellors.

Those people follow a different model in which the coach listens to the client and tries to get them to come up with a solution to their problems.

"We stimulate their brains. [Clients] learn by doing, not by talking," she said.

Given her personal history, Pearson understands the challenges people with ADHD face. She worked for years for a number of non-profits in the Jewish community, but kept on leaving after a relatively short time.

She also worked for the Ministry of Health Promotions, designing large health wellness programs for career counsellors.

Nevertheless, she found that her life was chaotic and tumultuous, and she wasn't meeting her career and relationship goals. "I was very quick and ambitious, but I was not able to follow through," she said.

Over time, "I created a system for myself and found that it's the basis of all our coaching."

Completely self-taught, Pearson designed the One Focus program based on what worked for her.

It seems to be working for others as well. The company is so busy, she is currently hiring three new coaches. And she no longer has time to do any coaching herself.

She's delegated that task and set her priorities. Looks like that part of her business life is firmly under control.

El Al frequent flyers aid three charities

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

El Al Israel Airlines, the official carrier of Taglit-Birthright, last month donated enough frequent flyer points to the organization to enable 125 young people to fly to Israel.

The airline, which has carried more than 50,000 Birthright participants to Israel over the years, supports Taglit-Birthright along with The Lone Soldier program and Make-A-Wish Israel.

Birthright is an international program that brings young people between the ages of 18 and 26 to Israel for a 10-day trip that aims at strengthening the bonds between Israel and Diaspora Jews.

Under El Al's GlobaLY program, the airline donates five per cent of the Matmid points accumulated by its registered frequent flyers, said Laura Parski, office administrator at El Al's office in Canada.

That subsidizes the airfare costs of the three charitable organizations, she added.

The points can also be exchanged for El Al tickets to fly lone soldiers abroad to visit their families or to fulfil the wishes of children with life-threatening illnesses.

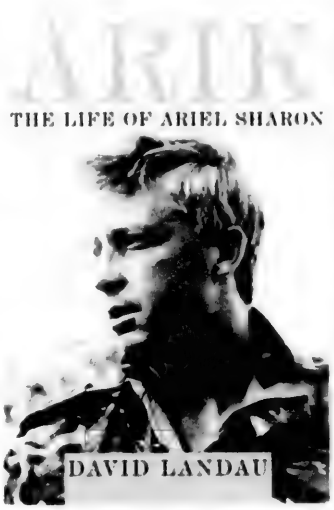
Anyone who wants to become a Matmid frequent flyer/GlobaLY member and have El Al donate points to the charities is asked to register on the El Al USA Facebook page.

Matmid members can contribute additional points from their personal accounts, in addition to the amount donated by El Al.

A superb recounting of Ariel Sharon's life

Arik: The Life of Ariel Sharon
David Landau
Alfred A. Knopf

Reviewed by Mordechai Ben-Dat



Few are the modern men who can be said to have been Shakespearean in their nature, their ways, their work and their legacy. The term, however, would apply to Ariel Sharon.

Revered as a hero, reviled as a villain, militarily skilled, militarily reckless, compassionate, brutish, a careful tactician, an uncaring bulldozer, a builder, a destroyer, an inspiring leader, a betrayer of promises, coarse, tender – all these descriptions and many more have been applied to Sharon, one of Israel's – and the Jewish people's – most compelling figures of modern times.

The famous general and prime minister died on Jan. 11. Even in illness, as in his life, Sharon confounded his friends and foes. He "fought" to stay alive for nearly eight years after he fell into a coma in January of 2006.

Thus it was a propitious coincidence of publishing that this biography by the Israeli journalist David Landau appeared just as Sharon's suffering was reaching its humane end.

Landau has written a highly informative work that chronicles the more than eight decades of Sharon's life. He paints a portrait of the grand figure with vast detail, paying meticulous attention to the myriad facts and opinions of the man that served as Landau's canvas. The result is a superb recounting of episodes and incidents – on the field where armies clashed or in the Knesset where politicians did battle – that leave one shaking one's head and catching one's breath. Needless to say, those battles were the very same struggles and profoundly affecting upheavals that have shaped the Jewish state.

Landau brings to his subject considerable experience as a writer and a visibly patent dedication to his craft. He has a law degree as well as a yeshiva education and has been writing for more than four decades after starting with the Jerusalem Post in 1970. Since then, he was the founding editor of the English edition of Ha'aretz and then the newspaper's editor-in-chief from 2004-2008. He still serves today as correspondent for The Economist. Landau has collaborated with Shimon Peres on his memoir, Battling for Peace, and on the book Ben-Gurion: A Political Life.

At the outset, Landau makes plain his left-leaning ideological orientation. It is the lens through which he views, assesses and explains the Israeli government's policies toward the Palestinians, especially the frequently vaudevillian but always woebegone process of discussions, negotiations, cold shoulders, warm embraces, polemics, posturing, debating and hectoring that we have euphemistically called the peace process.

For example, in the introductory pages, Landau refers to the return of the Jews to parts of the West Bank after the Six Day War as "Israel's misguided colonization of Palestinian territory." He deliberately chooses a loaded and pejorative term to ensure the reader knows precisely where he stands on the issue of the "settlements." Frequently, however, he sacrifices nuance and accuracy to make the more stinging political point compelled by his conscience.

There is no doubt that the Jewish settlements have become the sharply sharded scythe slicing away at Israel's standing, even among its friends, but Landau's blanket condemnation is excessive and unfair.

Setting aside for the moment the demographic, political, practical, ethical and moral concerns regarding Jewish communities in the heart of the West Bank, were Israelis not justified to return to the Old City of Jerusalem from which they were evicted? Were they not justified in returning to the hilltop south of Jerusalem that had been Kfar Etzion until 1948?

These questions are not merely rhetorical. They cut to the core of the century-old heartache that is the Israeli-Arab conflict: the rejection by the Arab League and the local Arab leadership of the right of Jews, as well, to be sovereign in the Middle East. However painful it might have been for them, the Jews did not reject the Arab right to sovereignty. The Jews did not launch a war against the local Arabs. The Arab League and the local Arab leaders launched a war of genocide against the Jews and their nascent state. Too often, Landau diminishes or evades the responsibility of the Palestinian leadership for the predicament of their people.

And yet, despite Landau's up-front political stance, the book is a praiseworthy achievement. At 635 pages, nearly 100 of which are original source documents, footnotes and index, it is massively researched, superbly organized and heavy with information.

As both praise for Sharon and lamentation for his country, Landau tells us why he undertook to write this biography.

"What he began during the dramatic years of his prime ministership (2001-2006), contradicting a lifetime of military extremism and political obduracy, entitles him…to a place of honour in Israel's annals. … When he was elected prime minister, many proud and patriotic Israelis talked seriously of leaving the country. His accession to power was the stuff of nightmares. The future seemed to hold only war and bloodshed. When he collapsed, less than five years later, we wept. Not just for him: for ourselves."

In one of his last addresses to the Knesset during the debate on the Gaza withdrawal, his heart crying, the bold, enigmatic prime minister explained what he had come to believe was the best way to protect his beloved Israel.

"This decision is unbearably hard for me. In all my years as a military commander, as a politician, as a minister, and now as prime minister I have never had to take such a hard decision.

"I know full well what this decision means for the thousands of Israelis who have been living in the Gaza region for so many years …who built homes there and planted trees there and grew flowers and raised boys and girls who have known no other home. I know full well. I sent them…I feel their pain, their fury, their despair.

"But as deeply as I understand what they are going through, I believe in the need to take this decision for disengagement and I am determined as deeply to carry it out. I am convinced in the depths of my soul and with my entire intellect that this disengagement will strengthen Israel's hold on territory vital for its existence, will win the support and appreciation of countries near and far, will reduce enmity, will break down boycott and siege and will advance us on the path of peace with the Palestinian and our other neighbours."

Nearly a decade after Sharon spoke these words and made the fateful decision to unilaterally withdraw Israel from Gaza, the peace he so determinedly sought is no closer at hand.

Landau's book helps us better understand the man who was felled, alas, before he could walk the final way on that path of peace.

A clean look at the city of sin

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Take kids to Las Vegas and there's no question, you have to work a little harder to keep them away from lewdness, profanity and the vulgarity for which Sin City has earned its reputation. But there's plenty of great activities for children along the strip and beyond, and a selection of shows and unique experiences that together can compose a memorable, fun family weekend.

Drawing with the Dolphins

The bottlenose dolphins at the Mirage Resort have no qualms about inscribing their artwork on canvas and gladly wrap their mouths around a paintbrush in exchange for fish. The resort offers a "painting with dolphins" activity where guests get close to the mammals, help direct their leaps and dives and come away with a canvas on which the dolphins have inscribed their unique signatures. Later, in a behind-the-scenes VIP tour of the dolphin habitat, guests are guided through the dolphins' kitchen and their healthcare room, where their daily vitamins are housed and later concealed inside fish.

"If we taught them to swallow pills, they'd swallow other small things that landed in their pools," explains Andi Leff, a dolphin educator. www.mirage.com

Sharks on the Strip

The Shark Reef Aquarium at Mandalay Bay is a phenomenal facility where the sharks swim in domed tanks around and above visitors, taking centre stage. But the many other salt and freshwater species are given great exposure, too, including crocodiles, piranhas, swordfish, jellyfish and more. Far from pure entertainment, the aquarium delivers an amazing educational experience about the ocean and its pollution by humans, as well as on fishing and sustainability. Educators positioned throughout engage children and help convey information in a fun way, while the touch pool gives kids an opportunity to feel the contours of manta rays that flap happily to the periphery and are thrilled to be petted. www.sharkreef.com

Bodies* is one of two exhibits at the Luxor

Luxor Highlights

Luxor is home to two permanent exhibits that sit side by side next to each other: Titanic and Bodies. The Titanic exhibit recreates the grandeur of the old sunken ship, exhibiting its silverware and crystal dishes, its beautiful staircase, its outdoor deck and some of the personal artifacts that were dredged up from the ocean floor. The exhibit also tries to recreate the final moments on the ship prior to its piercing by the iceberg. One of the final rooms houses a boulder-size block of ice to represent the iceberg. Most rooms contains photographs of the passengers on board, describing how they came to travel on the Titanic, what their destination was and where they were in their respective lives. Those pictures are powerful in humanizing the sinking and leave visitors with a better appreciation of some of the lives that met their end in the chilly Atlantic waters on a dark night in 1912.

The exhibit on Bodies can be a fascinating, empowering or difficult one for kids, depending on each one's individual psyche and ability to cope with the information and the actual bodies presented. Each body was once a live human being, preserved in such a way so as to highlight muscles, tendons, blood flow, organs, sexuality and health. Visitors are shown the difference between a healthy, pink-coloured lung and one blackened by years of smoking, while cancerous organs are also on display.

Arguably the most impactful room contains embryos and fetuses at various stages of in utero development, showing their growth from a pea-sized object into a fully formed infant. Some kids come away from the Bodies exhibit excited about what they've learned about the complexity of the human body while for others, like my daughter, the blackened lungs, cancerous organs and the knowledge she was staring at human corpses were downright freaky. Parental caution advised. wwwLuxor.com

AdventureDome at CircusCircus

Visit CircusCircus and you quickly start to appreciate the newer hotels on the strip. Make your way through this relic from the past and eventually you reach the AdventureDome, a large indoor playground with a rollercoaster and 24 other rides for kids age four and up. The dome is a warren of games, vendors, rides, mini-movies and activities, not all of them covered by the entrance fee ($27.95 for adults, $16.95 for kids). Try and time your departure to coincide with one of the free circus acts at the hotel, where individual performers demonstrate their talents. Be warned, the small viewing area fills up quickly. www.adventuredome.com

After Dark

Dancing with the Jabbawockeez: This all-male dance group delivers a high-energy, fun, entertaining performance filled with audience participation, humour, great music and skillful moves. Without a word being spoken, the boys in Jabbawockeez keep the show clean, lively and just the right length. www.luxor.com

Kings in Combat: Tournament of Kings is Vegas' entertainment at its most bizarre: A show set in medieval times that has kings on horseback competing with each other at breakneck speeds. The audience, divvied up to represent the various kingdoms, is encouraged to cheer their king in a full-velocity game that's like a fairytale come to life. The costumes are convincing, the actors never stop playing their parts and the chicken dinner delivered to each guest is consumed without a single piece of silverware. www.excalibur.com

The Human Circus: Cirque du Soleil's Mystere is showbiz at its finest – a combination of unique music, jaw-dropping acrobatic, balance and strength skills, dancing and lighthearted banter that's perfect for families. An ideal night out on the town, this is a show that captivates young and old, with an ingenious array of props, costumes and sets and a show that highlights creativity at its finest. www.treasureisland.com

Play chronicles events leading to Spinoza's expulsion

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Aris Athanasopoulos stars as Baruch de Spinoza in The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's presentation of David Ives' courtroom drama New Jerusalem, The Interrogation of Baruch De Spinoza at Talmud Torah Congregation: Amsterdam, July 27 1656.

The play is based on the actual interrogation and cherem, expulsion, of Spinoza, a young merchant and the heir apparent of Saul Mortera, the chief Rabbi of Amsterdam.

Although no written record exists of the interrogation on that fateful day, Ives succeeds in taking the audience back in time.

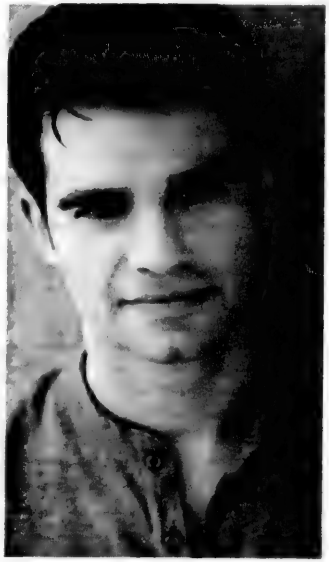
"Baruch was a 17th century philosopher of Portuguese descent," says Athanasopoulos. "The Inquisition in Spain and Portugal forced a lot of Sephardi Jews into Amsterdam. It was the only city in Europe at that time to allow them to live under certain provisions yet still be able to practise their religion somewhat freely and not be bothered.

"[Baruch] questioned a lot of things. He had the capacity and the intellect to come up with his own ideas. His questions included asking if God handed down the laws to Moses and if Moses actually heard them from God and wrote them down. The play is about whether to excommunicate him from the community or not."

Athanasopoulos says good theatre should ask questions but not always provide solutions. He hopes that people will talk about the play, debate the ideas and hopefully provoke some interesting thoughts and questions.

Athanasopoulos, who is Greek Orthodox, sees similarities in the Greek and Jewish communities. "I can definitely relate to this character because we come from very strong cultural backgrounds," the actor, who calls Toronto's Roncesvalles area home, says.

"There is a very strong diaspora of Greeks in Toronto and Mississauga, which is where I grew up. It is a very tight-knit community as well. Going to church on Sundays and to Greek school on Saturdays was something we did. My parents were very conscious and aware of losing their culture if they don't pass it on to their kids."



Aris Athanasopoulos

This is Athanasopoulos' first experience with the HGJTC. He is joined by actors Sascha Cole, James Graham, Michael Hanrahan, Amy Keating, Alon Nashman and HGJTC's co-artistic director David Eisner.

"The company has been wonderful, the group of actors are excellent and professional. Some of them have been working for a very long time and it shows. It has been a great experience for me."

Athanasopoulos' theatre credits include This Is It Romeo and Juliet, The Railway Children, A Midsummer Night's Dream and Finer Noble Gases. He has also acted in the TV shows The Strain, Rookie Blue, Change of Plans and The Firm, and a Canadian/Irish feature film Love, Rosie starring Lily Collins.

New Jerusalem is directed by Mitchell Cushman, the founding co-artistic director of the Toronto-based company, Outside the March.

New Jerusalem runs from March 15 to April 13 at the Studio Theatre in the Toronto Center for the Arts. For tickets call 1-800-985-2787 or online at www.hgjewishtheatre.com or at the box office.

Purim books for kids

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Kar-Ben Publishing has just released four new Purim titles geared to a spectrum of ages from infancy through age seven. All try to explain facets of the Purim story in different ways.

For infants and toddlers, the hardcover book When It's Purim by Edie Stoltz Zolkower, with illustrations by Barb Björnson, focuses entirely on the act of making hamantashen. Using a raccoon family as the main characters, it describes the tools you need to make these Purim treats and how to form them from the dough, and suggests sharing them with family, friends and teachers.

At the end of the eight-page book all the animal characters are holding greggers and are dressed in costume – but that's as close as we get to the Purim story in this tot-focused story.

Author Tilda Balsley aspires to tell the whole story of Purim in The Queen Who Saved Her People, a book beautifully illustrated by Ilene Richard and written entirely in rhyming couplets. For kids who want to act out the story, she suggests her book be performed as a theatre script with five parts, each of which has been thoughtfully written in a different colour so kids will easily recognize their part.

Balsley does a good job of covering all the bases of the Purim story in her book, which is best suited to children ages five through seven. At times, however, the rhymes feel a little forced. For instance, when King Achashverosh instructs his staff to search the land for potential brides, Balsley has him say they should come only after you have "Given them clean underwear/And treated them to free health care." Still, kids will enjoy play-acting The Queen Who Saved Her People and most of the time, the rhyming works just fine.

Sammy Spider's First Purim gives kids a glimpse of the Purim traditions from the eyes of a spider in the corner of a room, looking down on Josh and his family's preparations for Purim.

Sammy Spider asks his mother to interpret what's going on below and over the course of the book she explains how Josh is making a costume and gregger to take to synagogue that night, and how his mother is baking hamantashen.

Desperate to join in the fun, Sammy Spider has to be reminded that he's a spider and "spiders spin webs." When his curiosity gets the better of him he finds himself trapped inside the gregger and must call on his mother to rescue him. This is the 17th Sammy Spider book in the series and author Sylvia A. Rouss has partnered with illustrator Katherine Janus Kahn to deliver a quick, easy read with bright pictures and a mother-child dialogue that kids ages three through six will easily identify with.

Finally, in Barnyard Purim, Kelly Terwilliger describes a group of barnyard animals who, under the stage direction of Chicken, decide to put on their own Purim play.

Chicken assigns each of them a role and spends the rest of the book trying to assuage hurt feelings and distinguish between the role they are playing for the Purim play, and who they truly are. When a real fox creeps into the barnyard and hopes to eat Duck for his next meal, the animals are confused, thinking he is in costume. When they realize he's a real fox they spring into action to save Duck.

The story of Purim is a lively one with many characters – but by folding those characters into barnyard animals Terwilliger creates the potential for lots of confusion among her smaller readers. The illustrations by Barbara Johansen Newman are beautiful, though, and for those kids who understand the dynamics of the story, Barnyard Purim helps explain the differences between assuming an acting role and who you truly are beneath the costume.

Brothers make suits that are Made2Measure

Netaniel Lichtenstein, left, and his brother Hillel will come to your home to fit you for a custom-made suit.

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Back when they were high school students at Yeshivat Or Chaim in Toronto, Netaniel and Hillel Lichtenstein were already known for their entrepreneurial skills.

If you wanted to buy a baseball cap, a polo shirt, last year's BlackBerry, or maybe get a cellphone unblocked, they were the guys to go to.

Things haven't changed much. The 23-year-old fraternal twins – Netaniel is three minutes older – are still doing business, cutting deals, satisfying customers. This time, however, it's not a sideline they run out of their lockers at recess. The two brothers are the principals behind Made2Measure, a full-service custom clothier they founded in 2007, which offers suits, shirts, slacks and jackets at competitive prices.

It's a full-time occupation for the boys, to which they bring their formidable personal skills. Hillel is the tech-savvy guy, the one who runs the business' back office operations, but who can still get out on the road and fit a client. Netaniel is the one with the gift of the gab, or, as his brother said, "he's good with his mouth. He knows how to work a sale."

They've divided up business operations, but some sibling rivalry may have crept into their business relations. "He's older by three minutes," quipped Hillel. "He'll never let me live it down. When I get to his age, I'll understand."

But they each bring something important to the venture. Last week, Netaniel was in New York on business. When asked what was the most difficult obstacle in selling custom suits to potential clients, he said his clients simply can't believe they can buy a high-quality suit made of fine wool from prestigious manufacturers, for the same price you'd pay for something off the rack.

"People say, 'Why are your products so cheap when you say it's so good?'" he recounted on the telephone from New York. "I have to convince them we're giving them that product at a much better price point" than the competition.

Hillel said Made2Measure's suits run between $500 and $600. An equivalent item from a prestigious clothier would cost from $1,500 to $2,000, he added.

So how do they do it?

Made2Measure outsources its suit production to a factory in China, in which the brothers own a minority stake. That way, they can ensure that quality remains high and the supply chain provides the goods on time and on budget, said Hillel, who put his bar mitzvah gift money into the venture, along with profits from his many teenage ventures.

Besides price, Made2Measure competes on service, Hillel continued. "We're a service industry. Call us anytime... Let us come to you, anytime, anywhere."

The brothers, along with their six salespeople, will come to your office, boardroom or home, at your convenience. They bring along their sample suitcase with 600 swatches of cloth, and they'll measure 35 different points on the human body, to make sure the suit fits perfectly.

A lot of the guys who wear suits don't have the time or the patience to visit retail outlets. What could be better than getting fitted in your office or boardroom, or better yet, in the comfort of your living room after a hard day's work? he asked.

Although they maintain a website to publicize the enterprise, they get most of their business through word of mouth. They have 200 to 300 customers. Most come back for a second suit or another clothing item.

Since they started selling suits, the business has expanded tenfold. And Hillel believes the sky's the limit.

It was a serendipitous turn of events that got Hillel into the fashion business.

Near the end of high school, he asked his father, Robert, if he could accompany him on a business trip to China.

Hillel tapped into his earnings for the $1,800 ticket. While in China, he accompanied his dad to a fitting for a custom dress shirt. While his father was getting fitted, he struck up a conversation with the Indian-born tailor, from a company called New Bolwin Tailors, who was planning to visit New York on business. One thing led to another, and he invited the tailor to tack on a trip to Toronto for a couple of days to fit possible clients for hand-made suits.

Hillel didn't know if the man would follow through, but late one night he received a call from New York saying the tailor would be in Toronto soon.

Hillel quickly had 500 flyers printed, which he distributed to shuls and businesses along Bathurst Street. The flyers invited people to a fitting at a hotel north of Toronto.

A good number showed up, ready to plunk down the full cost of the suit, which would be manufactured in China and shipped back to Canada in a couple of months.

"We were skeptical if it would work out," worried that the tailor would just take the money and run, he said.

To his delight, the 30 suits that had been ordered started arriving, and customers were satisfied. Hillel donated his share of the proceeds to a pair of Toronto charities.

A year studying in a Jerusalem yeshiva put an end to that venture, and when he returned to Toronto, he enrolled at York University, where he took a double major in business administration and IT.

He took a job with an aerospace company, and while working in his new career, he continued to receive calls from former customers, inquiring about the next suit fitting.

Eventually, he made the decision to get back into the suit business full time. "It's now or never," he said. "You can build your own dream or get hired to build someone else's.

"I don't want to wake up in 10 years, married with kids, with expenses and a standard salary that doesn't cut it.

"I decided I wanted to take a risk. I'm still young, and together we can grow the businesses into a revolution in the way people shop," he said.

Age-old persecutions and the Holocaust

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

Since I am a geriatrician, all my patients are elderly, many of them in their late 80s or 90s, and a few over 100. Because I work in the Baycrest geriatric care system, many are Jewish, and as might be expected from the history of immigration to Canada, a good number are Holocaust survivors.

Many of my patients and their families assume, because of my deep interest in their Holocaust histories, that I am likely a child of Holocaust survivors. I am not, and really had little exposure to survivors until my adult years, despite having grown up in Brighton Beach, a very Jewish part of Brooklyn, N.Y. My maternal grandmother, with whom I shared our one bedroom along with my younger sister, was a pogrom survivor, having come to the United States as a teenager in the early 20th century.

I was amazed by the fact that she seemed to understand and speak many languages, which she explained in one of the many stories she told me about her life in Lithuania: "[The people] in charge changed all the time, so you had to figure out what was the right language to speak so that you would be left alone – Yiddish was not one of them."

My first recognition that there was something unusual about some of the people from Europe my grandmother knew came one summer when I was six or seven, and we went to Catskill's farm for a week's vacation.

My grandmother enjoyed her time very much. She was a singer in Yiddish choirs, and she and the other guests gathered in the common room in the evenings and sang songs in a multitude of eastern European languages and Yiddish. I noticed that most of the people had blue numbers on their forearms, the meaning of which I did not yet understand.

I was more taken with the young daughter of the people who owned the farm/guest house. She taught me how to catch flies by quickly running an open hand across a table or railing. We then took the fly, which was jiggling in the hand, tossed it into a beautiful spider web in the porch railing and watched the spider wrap the fly for some future meal. It was fascinating, but of course I did not get close to understanding the irony of subjecting a living thing to a trap and to death by another living thing, but this one was "nature" and not "human nature."

My adolescent years opened up the historical aspects of the Holocaust for me. I was very interested in the history of Nazi Germany, and with that, came the story of the Jews, although often not as the primary focus.

But during my medical school years in Scotland, I decided to spend a month as an exchange medical student in the obstetrics and gynecology department in Rambam Hospital in Haifa. The trip became an epiphany in my life, and led to my recognition of my place in the world and in the history of the Jews.

Most powerful was my working with Prof. Aharon Peretz, head of the department, who did a weekly German reparations clinic for those who qualified because of gynecological afflictions. I asked him after one clinic why he indicated on the necessary forms that virtually all the problems he saw in these patients he attributed to their Holocaust experience.

He looked at me and said, "As far as I am concerned, all of these conditions have their source in these women's Holocaust experience."

It was years later that I discovered that he was a key witness at Adolf Eichmann's trial: he had provided medical care in the concentration camps. Because of his aura and influence on me, my world changed. I eventually moved to Israel, but most importantly, my eyes and soul were opened to the Holocaust.

During my more than 37 years at Baycrest, I have been involved in the stories, fears, flashbacks, recountings of horror and heroism and survival that come with the survivors' repertoire. For that experience, I am forever grateful that I could somehow participate in that epoch and in our collective history.

My own family's experience of persecution predated the Shoah, but was part of the continuum that we must always remember as we honour those who came before us.

Creative hamantashen from the 'Queen of Kosher' Jamie Geller

JNS.org

We all recognize that poppy seed or jam taste when we bite into hamantashen on Purim every year. But given the right filling or dough, the traditional pastry has a lot more to offer.

Hailed as the "Queen of Kosher" and the "Jewish Rachael Ray," best-selling author Jamie Geller is the founder of the Kosher Media Network, publisher of Joy of Kosher with Jamie Geller magazine and JoyofKosher.com. Geller's online cooking videos have garnered more than one million views.

The following recipes, edited by JNS.org, were recommended by Geller and have appeared on JoyofKosher.com and in Joy of Kosher with Jamie Geller magazine.

CARDAMOM SCENTED HAMANTASHEN WITH PEAR AND GOAT CHEESE FILLING

By Pessy Haskelevich, writer for Joy of Kosher with Jamie Geller magazine

For a pareve version, simply replace the butter with canola oil and omit the goat cheese.

Pastry:
2 eggs
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 stick butter, or 1/4 cup canola oil juice and zest of 1 lemon
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
2 1/2 cups flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1-2 tsp. cardamom pinch of salt

Filling:
1/2 cup water
1/8 cup sugar
juice of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. fresh ginger, peeled and minced
1 lb. firm but ripe pears, peeled, cored and cut into 1/4-in. diced pieces
3/4 cup apricot jam
1/2 cup chopped walnuts
8 oz. soft goat cheese (optional)

In a mixing bowl, beat the eggs and sugar until light and fluffy. Add the rest of the ingredients and mix well. Divide the dough in half and chill in plastic wrap for half an hour.

Preparing the filling:

Combine the water and sugar in a medium saucepan and simmer over low heat until sugar has dissolved. Add the lemon juice, ginger and pears and simmer for an additional 10 minutes, or until pears are tender. Set aside to cool.

To assemble and bake:

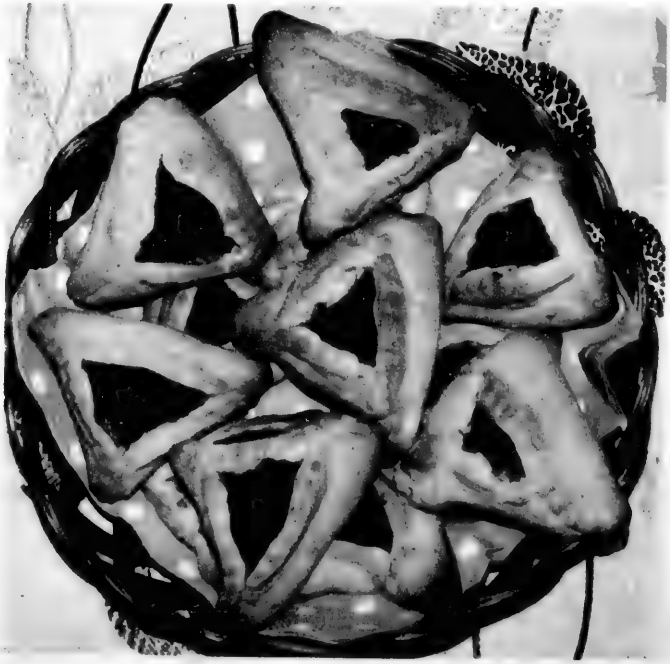
On a generously floured surface, preferably on baking paper, roll out the dough to a quarter-in. thickness. Roll once, then pick up the flattened dough and turn it 90 degrees.

Sprinkle with more flour if necessary and roll it out again. Repeat until dough is of sufficient thickness (this procedure helps prevent the dough from sticking). Use a round cookie cutter or glass with a 2-3 in. diameter to cut out circles of dough.

Smear a very thin layer of apricot preserves in the centre of each circle. Sprinkle 1/2 tsp. walnuts and a small piece of crumbled goat cheese. Top with 1 tsp. of pear jam.

Lift up the edges of the circle to form a triangle. Pinch the corners securely so that they don't open in the oven. Line a cookie sheet with baking paper and place the assembled hamantashen on the cookie sheet.

Chill the hamantashen in the freezer for about half an hour. Repeat with second half of dough. Bake the hamantashen in the oven at 375 for 20-24 minutes or until golden. Cool on rack. Makes 2 dozen.



GINGERBREAD HAMANTASHEN WITH SPICED APPLE FILLING

By Tamar Genger, executive editor, Joyofkosher.com

Cookie dough:
2 cups whole wheat flour
1 cup all purpose flour plus more for dusting
1 tsp. baking soda
1/4 cup brown sugar, packed
3/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/2 tsp. ground allspice
1/2 tsp. ground cloves
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. freshly milled black pepper
8 tbsp. unsalted margarine, room temperature
1/4 cup vegetable shortening, at room temperature
1/2 cup packed light brown sugar
2/3 cup unsulfured molasses
1 large egg

Filling:
6 tbsp. margarine, cut in 1-in. pieces
1/2 vanilla bean, cut lengthwise and scraped of seeds
3 large or 4 medium apples, peeled, cored and cut into eighths
1/4 cup brown sugar, packed

Gingerbread cookie dough:

Sift the flours, baking soda, cinnamon, ginger, allspice, cloves, salt and pepper through a wire sieve into a medium bowl. Set aside.

In a stand mixer, beat the margarine and shortening on high until well blended, about 1 minute. Add the brown sugar and beat until the mixture is light in texture and colour, about 2 minutes. Beat in the molasses and egg.

Using a wooden spoon, gradually mix in the flour mixture to make a stiff dough. Divide the dough into two thick disks and wrap each disk in plastic wrap. Refrigerate until chilled, about 3 hours. (The dough can be prepared up to 2 days ahead.)

Filling:

In a large skillet over medium heat add the margarine and vanilla bean and seeds. Cook about 5 minutes.

Add the apples and let them caramelize on one side, then turn and cook until they begin to caramelize. Sprinkle the brown sugar over the apples and cook, turning occasionally while they soften, about 10 minutes.

Remove from heat and remove vanilla bean, then puree in food processor and cool until ready to use.

When ready to assemble and bake the cookies, position the racks in the top and bottom thirds of the oven and preheat to 350.

To roll out the cookies, work with one disk at a time, keeping the other disk refrigerated. Remove the dough from the refrigerator and let stand at room temperature until just warm enough to roll out without cracking, about 10 minutes. (If the dough has been chilled for longer than 3 hours, it may need a few more minutes.)

Place the dough on a lightly floured work surface and sprinkle the top of the dough with flour. Roll out the dough 1/8-in. thick. Cut out 3-in. circles and use a spatula to place circles on a baking sheet lined with parchment.

Spoon a tsp. of filling into the centre of the circle of dough and fold together to form a triangle. Bake for 8-10 minutes, remove to wire rack to cool, and enjoy. Makes 36.

Never again will I be complacent

Evelyn Tauben
Special to The CJN

Recently on the pages of The Canadian Jewish News, a question has been debated regarding the meaning of the statement ubiquitous in Jewish circles: "never again."

Some say it has lost its charge, that these words, born out of the greatest human disaster, no longer rally us to the cries of the disadvantaged and troubled in our cities, countries or globally. Others maintain that "never again" was never intended as the slogan driving Jewish social justice, as the bumper sticker for a people who are supposedly a light unto the nations. No, it is a "force field of language," a Jewish watchdog, a constant reminder to be vigilant to impending threats to the Jewish People.

Comment

Rather than having evaporated, perhaps the substance of "never again" was never there. Do we mean "never again" just for the Jewish People or for humanity? In fact, it is not clear, and is further muddied by our collective trauma.

Until reading this unfolding conversation in The CJN, I sincerely (and apparently naively) believed that, generally speaking, all Jews abided by the notion that it is our shared responsibility in the wake of the Shoah to look out for the plight of people around the world. Elie Wiesel himself asserted in his Nobel Prize acceptance speech: "Wherever men and women are persecuted because of their race, religion or political views, that place must – at that moment – become the centre of the universe... And action is the only remedy to indifference, the most insidious danger of all."

If one abides by Wiesel's position, then the mantra of "never again" is not working, neither galvanizing nor substantively connecting us. In fact, this phrase is bandied about with such casual, ever-present usage that it dishonours the very victims and survivors of the Holocaust that it was intended to recognize. Furthermore, it is being misappropriated through misguided gestures.

Last fall, a documentary film about survivors of Auschwitz got an unusual amount of media coverage – not about the survivors themselves, but about some of their descendants who have taken to marking themselves with commemorative tattoos replicating their parents' or grandparents' Auschwitz prisoner numbers. And why?

Book Sign Removed

TORONTO — A midtown Toronto Indigo outlet took down a sign hawking a large Holocaust volume with the slogan "Oy Veh! Can't believe I read the whole thing!" The sign had been placed over racks holding the 768-page The Holocaust Chronicle, about the Jewish war-era experience in Europe, published in 2000. Journalist Marni Soupcoff launched a debate about the display when she posted photos of it. "I'm not sure Indigo has struck quite the right tone here," she tweeted. Indigo replied, "As soon as the sign was brought to our attention, it was removed."

Diary Arrest Made

TOKYO — Tokyo police arrested a city resident in connection with the vandalism of hundreds of copies of The Diary of Anne Frank in the Japanese capital's libraries. The suspect, identified in the March 12 announcement of his arrest as an "unemployed man in his 30s," admitted to some involvement in the vandalism of the books last month. Police arrested him March 7 for entering a bookstore in the Ikebukuro district to hang a poster without permission. It's not known what the poster said. Security footage from the store reportedly showed the same man wandering back and forth through sections dealing with the Holocaust, including the day some of the damage occurred. Police spotted the man in security footage from other locations where vandalism occurred. Pages were ripped from at least 265 copies of the diary and other Holocaust related books in libraries and bookstores.

Visa Policy Clarified

NEW YORK — Israeli tourists can enter Tunisia with pre-arranged papers, and Jews especially should feel comfortable attending a major Jewish festival in May, Tunisia's tourism minister said. Amel Karboul contacted JTA after 20 Israeli tourists aboard a Norwegian cruise liner were denied entry earlier this month. The story came to light after B'nai Brith Canada was contacted by a Jewish Canadian passenger on the ship. "We are open to all visitors," Karboul said March 13 from Paris, where she met with Jewish groups. Hundreds of Jews of Tunisian descent, including Israelis, attend annual festivities on the island of Djerba for Lag b'Omer, which is in May this year. "I want to use this occasion to invite the Jewish community to come and celebrate this pilgrimage with us." Norwegian Cruise Lines said the pre-arranged visa policy was a new one and that the denial of entry to the Israelis aboard its Jade ship was discriminatory. It cancelled stops in Tunisia until the country resolves the matter. Karboul said the policy was always in place, and that she was trying to reach company officials to explain what happened. She said visitors from countries such as Israel that don't have visa waiver agreements with Tunisia must arrange visas beforehand. She named Egypt and Brazil as being similar.

'Greatest Jewish Warrior Since Bar Kochba'

JERUSALEM — Courageous and controversial Israeli war hero Meir Har-Zion, a man Moshe Dayan once called "the greatest Jewish warrior since Bar Kochba," died March 14. He was 80 years old.

Meir Har-Zion

Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon said he was "one of the greatest warriors in the history of the IDF – an audacious, distinctive commander whose influence in molding generations of fighters and units was pivotal."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called him "one of our greatest heroes… [who] was steeped in love for the nation and the land."

Har-Zion, who rose to fame as a leader in Israel's first commando force, Unit 101, was born in Herzliya. He was drafted in the early 1950s and began his service in the Nahal Brigade. He later joined a commando unit led by a young Ariel Sharon that engaged in combat on a near-daily basis, and he led many cross-border raids. He later helped found Sayeret Matkal and fought in the Six Day War.

Israeli-Arab teen promotes coexistence

Camp Shomria program helps 'tear down walls and stereotypes'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Lina Jamal Medlij, a Palestinian girl from Haifa, was in Toronto last month to spread her message that she's living proof Jews and Arabs can coexist peacefully.

Medlij, who turns 18 this month, is an alumna of a program called Heart to Heart, which for the past four years has brought 20 Israeli youth between grades 7 and 9 – 10 Jewish and 10 Arab-Israeli – to Camp Shomria in Perth, Ont., for three weeks of dialogue and coexistence programming.

The program is offered through Givat Haviva Educational Foundation, an Israeli-based non-profit organization that promotes Jewish-Arab dialogue.

Medlij said she wanted to participate in the program to address any misconceptions she may have had about a group of people she knew so little about.

"I'm aware of the fact that even if I'm not connecting right now with Jews, when I grow up, in about three or four years, I will get the chance to talk to Jews and work with them, and I'm going to go out into the real world and I'm not going to stay in my home and in my village," she told The CJN.

"You hear a lot of stereotypes about a lot of subjects... and you don't have a perspective of your own. This was another thing that I wanted to know, to create for myself."

Medlij said her involvement with Heart to Heart exposed her to many new experiences.

"In Israel, we don't have camps, so it was a whole new experience for us, to be in Canada, and to live at a camp and also living with each other – Jews and Arabs – which is an opportunity we didn't have before," she said.

The time had come for my wife's unveiling. My kids and I wanted a monument that honoured her memory and captured who she was. A stone of lasting beauty, so that when we visited her grave, we felt close to her. The monument counsellor at Benjamin's Landmark designed a custom stone at a price we could afford. They truly took the utmost care.

'Jewish state' issue lingers — with good reason

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The lead editorial in the March 6 New York Times, "Israel's Choice," is instructive by inadvertently capturing precisely what's profoundly – and so commonly – wrongheaded in many people's comprehension of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and how to resolve it.

Placing the onus for progress squarely on Israel, the editorial starts with the premise that the Palestinians, led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, genuinely want a two-state solution and that, despite his oft-declared support, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is blocking it.

The Times criticizes Netanyahu for the seemingly unreasonable demand that the Palestinians recognize Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish People, while failing to acknowledge that, according to the latest polls, about 80 per cent of Israeli Jews (including a majority of those on the left) believe such recognition is important.

The Times writes that the Palestinians already "recognize Israel as a state, but not as a Jewish state, because they believe that would undercut the rights of the Palestinian refugees."

Precisely. Yet, the Times then fails to connect the dots: the Palestinian claim of a "right of return" for millions of Palestinian refugees to Israel would eventually mean both the elimination of the State of Israel and the creation of another Arab state in its place. (It was the UN itself which in 1947 recommended the creation of two states for two peoples – Arab and Jewish.)

In short, the Times fails to understand that the Palestinian refusal of what is an Israeli consensus, not a "right-wing" demand, amounts to the rejection of the genuine "two state" solution the paper insists Abbas and the Palestinians support.

So, in an absurd inversion of logic, the Times faults those supporting the essential condition for a genuine two-state arrangement, namely, that the Palestinians accept the right of the Jewish People to national self-determination – just as the majority of Israelis accept that the Palestinian people have a right to their own state: two states for two peoples.

The Times' self-refuting inability to grasp what's at issue is breathtaking.

As the liberal former MK Einat Wilf wrote in the Jerusalem Post during German Chancellor Angela Merkel's visit to Israel last month: "Palestinian recognition of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish People is not a condition for peace – it is the very essence of peace… Israel does not need Palestinian recognition in order to know what it is [but rather] the Palestinians need to recognize Israel as the Jewish state for their own sake and dignity and for the cause of peace."

The only chance for real progress toward peace is mutual recognition. Minority Israeli factions on the right who deny the Palestinians are a people with a right to statehood are the (less numerous) mirror opposites of Palestinians who deny that Jews are a people with the same rights. In April 2008, the Economist magazine, which is generally unsympathetic to Israel, observed: "It is ironic that the fundamental disagreement between Jews and Palestinians today is not about whether there should be a Palestinian state; most Israeli Jews accepted that long ago. It is about whether there should be a Jewish one." Sadly, since then, this "acceptance gap" has not diminished. Indeed it may have expanded.

In the past few weeks, Abbas has insisted that recognizing Jewish statehood is "out of the question" and that "There is no way. We will not accept [it]."

He was then joined by the Arab League, which ostensibly stands behind the Saudi/Arab Peace Initiative when it comes to Israel, but which declared in Cairo on March 9: "The council of the Arab League confirms its support for the Palestinian leadership in its effort to end the Israeli occupation over Palestinian lands, and emphasizes its rejection of recognizing Israel as a 'Jewish state.'"

U.S. President Barack Obama, among other western leaders, understands what's at stake. Meeting with Abbas in Ramallah on March 23, 2013, Obama declared: "We seek an independent, a viable and contiguous Palestinian state as the homeland of the Palestinian people, alongside the Jewish State of Israel – two nations enjoying self-determination, security and peace" (emphasis added).

Two out of three ain't bad

Last week, the Knesset passed three important bills presented by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's governing coalition. Two of them are strong pieces of legislation that empower the Israeli voting public. The third risks quite the opposite occurring.

The most historic of the new laws will see the vast majority of Israel's ultra-Orthodox be drafted into the army, or face the prospect of imprisonment. I have previously advocated in favour of the haredi conscription law because it is, in a word, fair. Sure, Torah study may very well be a useful tool in the defence of Israel (though it's a difficult metric to track), but that doesn't mean Israel's ultra-Orthodox shouldn't share equally in the responsibility to fill the ranks of the Israel Defence Forces. But don't take it from me: most Israelis feel the same way.

Netanyahu's coalition also pushed through a bill that promotes a 2010 law – which subjects land-for-peace deals to a public referendum – to the level of "basic law," or quasi-constitutional status. The bill is not without flaws – it won't apply to the West Bank, where ceding territory will almost certainly be part of any peace deal with the Palestinians – but it is inherently good. If and when the time comes for Israel to decide whether to give up land for peace, all Israelis should have their say. It's the only way every citizen will be able to live with the result, whichever way the vote swings.

The last of the three laws passed by the Netanyahu government raises the electoral threshold from two per cent to 3.25 per cent. Put plainly, if a party does not receive enough votes to earn at least four seats in the 120-seat Knesset, it will get no seats at all. As a result, smaller political parties will be forced to merge or be folded into one of the major parties. The government and its supporters argue that raising the threshold will make the process of forming coalition governments less chaotic by reducing the number of parties with representation in the Knesset. But if the smaller parties don't, or can't, find partners, there is the risk that some Israelis' votes will effectively count for nothing.

Still, as the great vocalist of our time, Meat Loaf, once said: "Two out of three ain't bad."

Last week in this space, I wrote about this newspaper's bold new direction. While the specific features I outlined were fake – a Purim gag – the central premise of the column was true: on April 10, The CJN will debut the results of our redesign project. Look closely through this week's issue, and you'll find two hints about the future of The Canadian Jewish News.

As a bonus, I'm also revealing one of the features you can actually expect to find beginning April 10. It's called "Rabbi2Rabbi," wherein two Canadian rabbis will engage in a written conversation about current events, community issues, cultural quandaries or Jewish law. Who's right? That, my friends, is up to you to decide.

Next week, I'll tell you more about what you can expect in the new CJN, including "Back Story."

Purim issue fails good taste test

Proper style and esthetic standards should characterize The Canadian Jewish News, even when the newspaper offers its readers a funny "Purim Torah." A Purim Torah may be irreverent, bold and even risqué, but while it must be clever, it must also obey the rule of good taste. A Purim Torah may puncture the inflated balloon of pompous sacred platitudes, but good taste must still be respected. Your lead article in your Purim issue ("Write your own sermon in 7 easy steps," The CJN, March 13) on how to make your own sermon is neither clever nor in good taste. You may lampoon sermons – that is certainly permissible – but your writer brings no honour to his pseudonym, Hershel Ostropolier, the legendary Yiddish jester.

Your editorial, too, promising new features in the future CJN, is in poor taste. I hope it is only an attempt at a Purim Torah and an April Fool's joke.

Obama just 'doesn't get it'

U.S. President Barack Obama is actually isolating the United States from the world by his actions. It's sad that Obama doesn't get it, nor does he learn from history. ("Obama warns of fallout without peace deal," cjnews.com).

Prime Minister Stephen Harper does get it, in his concrete actions against terrorism, such as with full sanctions and not just tough, dramatic words.

Obama, why don't you talk tough to Iran, Syria and Russia instead of to your "best ally, Israel"? Israel needs your support right now, not your threats.

If it's your legacy as president you are worried about, how about focusing on your best ally, Israel, to forge a mutual friendship and gain from each other's talents and resources.

I'll never forget how you said before your first election, standing in Sderot, "If I had rockets in my backyard, I'd defend myself."

And now you're pushing Israel to give away more land, after giving back Gaza has caused untold disaster. This will only cause more rockets to be launched and encourage more terrorism in Israel.

If you call yourself a great friend, act like a friend and put the pressure on countries like Iran, Russia and Syria instead.

Harper's trip to Israel

It's so good to hear that we have Bernie Farber's tepid approval of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's visit to Israel ("Harper's Israel trip worth the $239,000 price tag: CIJA," The CJN, Feb. 27). I find it pathetic that the former leader of our now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress criticizes out loud our prime minister for his audacity in wasting money on visiting Israel.

There is a reason that the Canadian Jewish Congress is no longer, and that reason can be directly traced to its former leader. As a Jew and as a supporter of Israel, I think it's imperative that we support our prime minister on this. If not us, who will?

On another note, Farber never misses a chance to attack and smear the good name of the Jewish Defence League, even on unrelated issues such as Harper's visit to Israel. Meir Weinstein, the JDL's national director, has risked his life for Jewish and Israeli causes and is recognized by our prime minister as a valued friend of Canada.

How to aid Jews in Ukraine

It is well known that in any political war, invasion or fighting, although everyone is at risk, Jews are usually more so.

Before aiding Ukrainian Jews in their hometowns, where they will become targets ("Jewish Agency steps in to aid Ukraine Jews," The CJN, Feb. 27), it would be wise for us to offer them land and freedom in Israel, especially in Judea and Samaria, where more Jews are needed.

Looking at the Ukrainian situation, it seems that Jews will likely become targets. If Ukrainian Jews are given the opportunity to emigrate to Israel, their lives will probably be saved, and Israel will be better able to defend Judea and Samaria. So Israel and the Jewish community can win both ways.

Is criticism of Israel anti-Semitic?

Andrew Griffith

Over the past few years, the Jewish community and many governments have paid attention to a resurgence of anti-Semitism. The Canadian government, most recently in Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Knesset speech, framed anti-Semitism in broad terms, including virtually any criticism of Israel.

But is such a broad definition helpful to understanding what is anti-Semitism and what is not? More importantly, does it help engage other communities, or does it risk undermining support for anti-Semitism measures?

Anti-Semitism is one form of hate and intolerance and shares many of the characteristics of other forms of prejudice and non-acceptance. In many cases, people who demonstrate hatred or intolerance to Jews also do so with other groups.

However, anti-Semitism is unique in a number of ways. Viewing Jews as a "collective" that controls society, is unique to anti-Semitism. Characterizing Jewish advocacy groups such as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) or the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) as "controlling" also has anti-Semitic overtones, but criticism of their particular positions is not.

Holocaust denial and distortion are intrinsically anti-Semitic, just as denial of other genocides and atrocities expresses hate and intolerance.

Accusing Canadian Jews of dual loyalties can be anti-Semitic. Dual attachments are common to most ethnic communities, and it is no different for Canadian Jews and Israel.

The link between anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment is more complex. Not all criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic in nature, whether with respect to Israel itself (e.g., resettling of Bedouin from the Negev, the proposed Israeli law banning the use of "Nazi") or in the occupied territories (e.g., settlements, use of collective punishment). The lively debate within Israel illustrates this.

How do we judge whether criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic or not?

Questioning the legitimacy of Israel itself has, at the very least, anti-Semitic overtones if it's not explicitly anti-Semitic, given the reasons for Israel's establishment, that the vast majority of its population is Jewish and the implications of acting upon such questioning.

FORMER SOUTH AFRICAN PRESIDENT NELSON MANDELA ON ISRAELI APARTHEID: APARTHEID:
WRONG FOR SOUTH AFRICANS, WRONG FOR PALESTINIANS END ISRAELI APARTHEID!

A woman protests against "Israeli apartheid" in Washington D.C. Labelling Israel as an apartheid state has anti-Semitic overtones, Andrew Griffith says. [File photo]

Labelling Israel as an apartheid state and the boycott, divestment and sanction campaign (BDS) have anti-Semitic overtones when applied to Israel itself. While Israel has its internal integration challenges, it in no way resembles South African apartheid. There are no racial mixing laws, and Israeli Arabs have voting rights and are represented, albeit imperfectly, in a wide range of Israeli institutions.

However, the BDS campaign as applied to the occupied territories is not necessarily anti-Semitic, as the campaign can be viewed as legitimate pressure on Israeli policies and activities. Singling out companies like SodaStream or institutions like Ariel University is not anti-Semitic; boycotts on Israeli companies and universities within Israel are a different matter. However, much of the messaging of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) and BDS campaigns neither distinguishes between Israel itself and the occupied territories, nor is careful about language with anti-Semitic overtones.

Similarly, singling out Israel for criticism is not necessarily anti-Semitic. Israel is rightly held to a higher standard given the reasons for its founding, its democratic character and its membership in the OECD (Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development) and the UN Western group. Language is important here. In the UN context, this can cross into anti-Semitism, given the disproportionate focus on Israel compared to other countries with worse human rights records.

How should we deal with anti-Semitism?

First, we must recognize that increased anti-Semitism is a legitimate domestic and international concern, and not dismiss raising the issue as a way to blunt criticism of Israel. However, we also need to engage a broader range of Jewish groups than CIJA and B'nai Brith (e.g., organizations such as JSpace, the New Israel Fund and the Jewish Refugee Action Network) to ensure a more nuanced understanding of what is and what is not anti-Semitic. The credibility of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition on Combating Antisemitism suffered from its lack of inclusiveness.

Secondly, we must strengthen messaging on the commonalities between anti-Semitism and other forms of hatred and intolerance. Some of the pioneering work by Jewish communities is being lost in the focus on anti-Semitism. More express links among all forms of hatred, racism and discrimination can help combat anti-Semitism through engagement of a broader range of communities. The activities of the Holocaust centres in Canada in educating our increasingly diverse population are good examples. Perceived exclusive government focus on anti-Semitism may undermine understanding and support among other communities.

Thirdly, more clarity between criticism of Israel proper and Israeli policies in the occupied territories may be helpful in separating out what can be perceived as anti-Semitic and what should not. A large part of criticism of Israel is based upon its actions and politics in the occupied territories. While it is naive to think that such a distinction would by itself reduce anti-Semitism, clarity in language and objective would be helpful. It would force critics of Israeli policies to declare themselves. IAW and BDS have often been fuzzy in this regard. The same applies to defenders of Israeli policies. Just as many critics of Israel give the impression that Israel can do no right, many supporters give the impression that Israel can do no wrong.

The politics of the Middle East will always colour discussion about what is anti-Semitism, as will the continued need to recognize the concerns of the Jewish community. However, a broader discussion of anti-Semitism in relation to other forms of racism and discrimination, recognizing both the unique experience of the Jewish community and the shared experience with other communities, is needed.

Food helps us remember lost communities

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Food is our final frontier. Go where no cook has gone before – especially between Purim and Passover, I seem to think of nothing but food.

Our annual Torah reading begins with the most famous fruit tree of all, the tree of knowledge of good and evil in the primordial garden, the supposed cradle of humanity and origin of evil. Sort of a foodie Jewish Pandora's box.

Eve's snack, "the fruit of that forbidden tree which brought death into the world and all our woe" (Milton), is the first indication of the importance food will play in our tribal future. Recall the honey that Samson scoops out of the lion as he trots toward his doom at the hands of Delilah. It's enough to make you go on a diet.

The Land of Israel is pictured as flowing with milk and honey, prolific with the seven species. Liberated Israelites longed for the cucumbers, leeks, melons, garlic and onions they left behind in Egypt. Even then, they were creating a cuisine.

I learned the craft of kosher cooking from books and cooks. A Pennsylvania German background wasn't useful. I had mentors who set up our kosher kitchen and helped me acquire recipes to guide me. My matzah balls are still lopsided, however.

Claudia Roden's cookbook The Book of Jewish Food is alive with the history and cultural meaning of her recipes. She points out that the mobility of the disbursed Jewish communities across the globe gave them access to a huge variety of cuisine, which they adapted to their own needs and dietary restrictions. She calls it "a culture within a culture, a nation within a nation."

Food is "a link with the past, a celebration of roots, a symbol of continuity."

Yet most of the communities she writes about are now restricted to the few countries – including Israel, of course – where Jews now live. Upheavals of the 20th century forced a rearrangement of these communities. Recipes that evoke, say, her Egyptian roots, now are cooked by families in other lands. They're family dishes that are a symbol of that homeland, no longer food created in a place where Jews flourish.

A stark example of displacement is found in the recipes in In Memory's Kitchen, collected in Terezin. As the introduction notes, "cooking, both doing it and talking about it, was central also to the societies from which many of the women of Terezin... came. It was also among the chief activities that defined them as wives and mothers." The book is not a cookbook that one might turn to in preparing a dish. It is instead a tribute to the courage of the women who created it, determined to retain their dignity in the face of horror.

I said at the beginning that I had to learn to cook for a kosher household. Perhaps my festival dishes represent a mash-up of the people I have met over the years, and the foods they prepared. So at Rosh Hashanah, we read the Iraqi seder before beginning the meal. A family favourite is the verse about leeks – translated as, "With these leeks may your luck never lack."

For Purim this year, my granddaughter and I made sand tart cookies to go into mishloach manot – sand tarts being a Pennsylvanian Dutch recipe for that winter holiday. We will also add red velvet cupcakes, which I discovered in New York City.

At Pesach, we will savour huevos haminados (recipe from the Sarajevo Hagaddah), potato kugel from my mother-in-law (Poland), a brisket (Russia? Ukraine?), a loaf of carrots, apples, raisins and honey (Nina Rousso), and a chocolate mousse cake that seems to be a local invention. We also use both horseradish and a date mixture on the seder plate, although the latter seems too sweet to bring bitterness to mind.

For the vegetarian meal, a Sephardi Passover pie, eggplant mina. For a breakfast treat, leek-cheese pancakes (Sephardi) and sugared matzah from Morocco.

What we eat can take us, as Roden tells us, on an "odyssey from Samarkand to New York." It's a delicious journey, somewhat like Shakespeare's audience for Henry V, asked to imagine "within the girdle of these walls confined two mighty monarchies." Rather, all our lost kingdoms are confined within our tables. Thus we reconstitute whole communities, from the farthest east to the farthest west.

Saying Kaddish again, but still invisible

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I'm saying Kaddish again, and this time it's harder!

I thought it would be easier the second time around but I was wrong. This time, I am acknowledging being an orphan. Ordinarily, facing the death of an aged parent is not traumatic. In fact, we were all waiting for Mom to die – even Mom. So no tragedy here, yet facing the absence of the parental generation is unexpectedly difficult. There is no one left on either side of my family – no buffer generation between me and my own mortality. I am next. It's all normal, yet disconcerting.

As I say Kaddish, I wonder at the passage not just of time, but of generations. My parents were immigrants. Now my children and grandchildren have no concrete connection to the glory and suffering of the European Diaspora. I'm now the representative of Jewish tradition and heritage. As I say my daily Kaddish, I get to contemplate my own mortality and my new position of heritage connector.

I feel alone and unequal to the task. I want to ask my parents many questions, seek their guidance, but they're not here. Relief, regret and fear equally emerge during prayers.

Clearly, facing the death of a loved and cherished parent is supposed to be difficult and demanding. But there's another factor related to my struggle.

I have lost patience with male desire to keep me invisible. The absence of any true responsiveness to my Kaddish is almost unbearable. The whole purpose of saying Kaddish is to be in a community, with a minyan representing that community so that they may answer your words and respond to your call sanctifying God's name and presence.

Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik once wrote: "The Kaddish marks the beginning of a new phase of courageous and heroic mourning with a message of divine salvation... Through the Kaddish, we hurl defiance at death and its fiendish conspiracy against man." Accordingly, the prayer declares, "No matter how powerful death is, notwithstanding the ugly end of man... no matter how black one's despair is... we declare and profess publicly and solemnly that we are not giving up, that we are not surrendering, that we will carry on the work of our ancestors."

In saying Kaddish, I declare that I am part of that process.

Thus gender erasure is unacceptable. I'm no longer able to ignore their attempt to expunge me from the community. And it happens ubiquitously in the Orthodox world, and sometimes in the Conservative one as well. Even in the places that self-identify as women-friendly, there is a tangible discomfort with women's Kaddish. I've experienced this in New York, Israel, Florida and Montreal. In Florida, they asked me to lower my voice and say it silently! Do they understand how absurd that is?

At this point, many of you will want to shake me and say, "Look how far we have come!" Surely I know of all the advances both within the Orthodox world and in the other denominations. I know and teach about our current successes. We're the most Jewishly educated generation ever, and that includes our women. There are new rituals centred on women, and new positions of authority that recognize women's advanced leadership potential. I know all that.

Yet we're constantly being deprived full accommodation. Even in the most liberal of our sectors, women still are not at the top, are not paid equally, and are still harassed or complimented on how good they look rather than on how smart they are. Little girls still want to dress up as Esther, not because she was the heroine who risked her life and taught us about communal bonds, but because she won the beauty contest.

I understand there are women in the haredi world who dress "to the nines." They are combating invisibility. How do I do that in my synagogue, in a male world?

My Kaddish is as important and sanctioned as anyone else's. Yes, there was a controversy about women saying Kaddish. But so many contemporary halachists have approved this practice. We should have no tolerance for male unresponsiveness or opposition. I want to say Kaddish as a Jew for the neshamah of my dear departed mother. And I expect the congregation, male and female to respond. The tradition that I now represent mandates it.

History matters

Jimmy Bitton

In the 2002 romantic-comedy My Big Fat Greek Wedding, the Greek protagonist Toula Portokalos grumbles that when she was growing up, she knew she was different.

"The other girls were blond and delicate and I was a swarthy six-year-old with sideburns. I so badly wanted to be like the popular girls… all sitting together, talking… eating their Wonder Bread sandwiches."

Toula grew up in a traditional Greek home, yet felt strong pressure to choose between her heritage and the collective culture of her Canadian society. She believes a choice is needed because she cannot reconcile her father's religious and cultural dogmatism and strong sense of Greek particularism with modern western society's constructed edifice of individuality. To her father's chagrin, Toula later falls for Ian Miller, a quintessential upper-middle-class white Anglo-Saxon Protestant.

Her father struggles to come to terms with the rupture of cultural continuity that Toula's actions will cause across future generations. For Toula, the impulse to assimilate is equally, if not more intense than the pressure to preserve her culture.

For Diaspora Jews, Toula's experience is all too familiar. Jews, in staggering numbers, are embracing modern western society at the expense of their own heritage. The recent Pew Research Center report confirms, along with other things, that American Jews are following the same trajectory as many other Americans by eschewing religion. The report paints a grim portrait of Jews in the Diaspora, with intermarriage rates at 58 per cent, and a staggering 71 per cent among non-Orthodox Jews.

Evidently, Jews are abandoning synagogues in increasing numbers. Like Toula, Jews are bombarded by tantalizing suggestions of wealth, relativism and alternative lifestyle choices, while simultaneously being pulled in the opposite direction by a heritage that is perceived as antiquated, and in extreme cases, as some form of neurosis. These push-pull variables make assimilation all the more likely.

While assimilation is a tragic reaction to emancipation, isolation (the extreme opposite of assimilation) is a tragic reaction to assimilation. At his retirement dinner, the former chief rabbi of Britain, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, recently stated that "those who embrace the world and reject Judaism, and those who embrace Judaism and reject the world" represent a "global danger" to Jews and Judaism.

Unlike isolationism, assimilationism never took root in North America as a full-blown ideology. While not much can be done to encourage integration of Jews who subscribe to an isolationist ideology, much can be done to discourage others from assimilation. Current efforts to address assimilation include strengthening Jewish ties to Israel and outreach programs aimed at bringing Jews closer to Judaism.

A traditional definition of Jewish identity is that Jews are principally Jews by religion. This construal of an "authentic" Jewish identity can leave secular Jews out in the cold. The Pew Report confirms that most Jews (62 per cent) view being Jewish as mainly a matter of ancestry and culture, while only 15 per cent view it as mainly a matter of religion.

Currently, secular and purely cultural manifestations of Jewish identity are halfway houses to assimilation. Therefore, putting resources into encouraging Jews to embrace their religious heritage is a valuable and necessary enterprise to curb assimilation. Judaism can offer Jews a sense of belonging, meaning to life and a moral compass to navigate their way in all aspects of life.

Whereas one may or may not choose to embrace religion, history on the other hand, is a fixed and inseparable identity. Jewish history offers narratives that relate most Jews to each other in genealogical ways. History defines a trajectory that can help to construct the essence of a Jewish identity and is an essential ingredient in maintaining identity.

Because history is a fixed designator, it can also induce affinity, deep self-awareness and even loyalty. Simultaneous to this, historical literacy is both leavened and enlivened by its engagement with key contemporary questions. History gives a historical framework that helps Jews contextualize the present in relation to the past, which can translate to a concrete Jewish identity. Learning Jewish history can be a vanguard of Jewish continuity in North America which can encourage Jews not to assimilate while they simultaneously work to integrate.

'Muslim-only' enclaves: lead to integration or ghettoization?

Raheel Raza

Canada is home to a large number of ethnic communities, and it's natural that when immigrants come to a new land, they tend to congregate in areas where others like them have settled.

There are also some communities that have been marginalized in their homeland, so they tend to stick together. One example is the Ahmadiyya Muslims who have been persecuted in Pakistan, so now they live mostly in Vaughan, Ont., where they are close to each other and their mosque. In their particular case, it's understandable that they feel vulnerable and tend to find security in proximity to each other.

Now there's news that residents of a Thornhill, Ont., community are proposing to construct two residential highrise buildings and 61 townhouses in a low-density neighbourhood. The proposed condos would be built on the site of the Jaffari Community Centre, at 9000 Bathurst St., and would contain 377 units, primarily for Muslims.

There has been some push-back from residents who live in the Thornhill Woods neighbourhood, located right beside the community centre. Some residents started an online petition that has garnered more than 2,500 signatures against the development. They claim their resistance to the condos is due to worry about overcrowding and parking issues.

Other residents in the neighbourhood are also expressing concerns that the proposed housing will be subsidized, thereby decreasing their property values. As a show of community support, it would behoove the Shia Ithna Asheri Jamaat of Toronto (ISIJ), which runs the centre, to build low-cost housing that would be available to everyone in the area.

"Muslim only" enclaves are a reality in Europe, the United Kingdom and America, where they are sometimes funded by local governments and come with a slew of problems.

In Britain, where this idea first took root, followers of Anjem Chaudhry who runs the banned militant group Islam4UK, have set up "sharia zones" in different cities.

According to Daniel Pipes of the Middle East Forum, "There exist already some 10 to 20 Muslim-only enclaves in Canada and the United States, the villages run by Muslims of the Americas, a group affiliated with the Pakistani group Jamaat ul-Fuqra." In a recent letter to the U.S. government, some progressive Muslim groups have asked for Jamaat ul-Fuqra to be labelled as a terrorist group.

Now we're faced with the idea of a Muslim-only enclave in the Toronto area, and it's being pushed by a community that has recently faced controversy.

The Jaffari community is part of the ISIJ, which runs the East End Madrassah (EEM), a Sunday School that uses the premises of a public school to hold its classes for Muslim children. Based on a complaint, they were investigated for using a curriculum that promoted hate against Jews. There is concern that the curriculum being taught at EEM was created in Iran. No charges were laid.

In my opinion, the idea of a Muslim-only residential enclave is not in keeping with Canadian values. One of the questions that occurs to me is "How will the children growing up in this enclave learn to integrate into Canadian society?" When asked why he supported the building of the ISIJ condo project, a member of the Jaffari community said, "My family will be close to the mosque." If their only criteria for living in Canada and bringing up family here is to be close to their mosque, they might as well have stayed in an Islamic country.

Studies have shown that Muslim youths who grow up in ethnic enclaves are more susceptible to being radicalized compared to those who have a chance to mix and mingle in the public space. So we have reason to be concerned.

The other question we need to ask is whether the decisions of Muslim communities in Canada should be influenced by the politics of Iran and Saudi Arabia, or should these decisions be based on our collective sense of Canadian national identity and safety?

As a Muslim with a family to raise in Canada, when we immigrated 26 years ago, there was no pressure to live in a Muslim enclave. We knew we were coming to a country where we have freedom of religion and where we can follow our faith anywhere and in any way we want. However, we wanted to have our kids grow up with the Canadian values of individual freedom, gender equality and liberty, while contributing the best from their own world.

Volunteers pack their cars with Passover food boxes on their way to be delivered last year.

Passover food drive returns minus chickens

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, is gearing up to pack and deliver more than 2,500 Passover food boxes to needy Jews across the GTA.

Jews living under the poverty line, recent immigrants in need and people with disabilities have benefited from the organization's Passover Food Drive for the past 31 years.

"It's a tradition that allows people the dignity and the choice to celebrate," said Glenda Cooper, Passover Food Drive chair.

"Costs are so prohibitive, especially on Passover... so this just allows them the choice. Part of the Passover Food Drive is just to recognize people for who they are and that we see them as people, and just because they can't afford something, doesn't mean to say that they shouldn't be able to celebrate. That's really what we're trying to get across."

This year, Cooper and her committee of eight women have had to adjust to some changes. For one, the boxes – which contain items such as matzah, cereal, grape juice, canned fruit, Haggadahs and candles – won't include chicken.

"We used to get chickens from Chai Poultry, but Chai is no longer [in business]," Cooper explained. "[The owner] used to donate them to us for free for many years. It really was an added gift. This year, we don't have Chai and we couldn't afford to buy chicken... so BurnBrae Farms, the egg company, donated coupons for free eggs, so they're still getting a protein."

Cooper said the committee is also trying a new approach when it comes to advertising. For the past 30 years, they had inserted brown paper grocery bags into Metroland newspapers and The CJN.

"This year, we said there are no more bags. A lot of people weren't using them. It was a fortune of money just to go to the garbage, so I turned the advertising around a little bit. Until now, we didn't really advertise on TV or do much electronically," Cooper said, adding that the committee chose instead to run more ads in The CJN and on cjnews.com, and they've even advertised on CP24.

"We're trying to reach a far broader spectrum," she said, adding that they also have a social media presence on Facebook and Twitter.

As for a fundraising strategy, Cooper said the committee partnered with Jewish day schools to run an art competition. Students designed Passover greeting cards, and five winners were chosen. The cards were printed and are selling in packs of five for $25.

What hasn't changed is that food bins are available at grocery stores such as Sobeys, No Frills and Longos, where people can donate non-perishable kosher-for-Passover food items.

"We're doing our food drives from March 23 to April 2... People can drop off food in the boxes [at participating grocery stores], but at some stores, they can also purchase pre-packs, so they don't even have to think about what to buy. They just pick up a bag and pop it into the food box," Cooper said.

Delivery day is April 6, and Cooper said the committee will need a lot of volunteer drivers to distribute the boxes.

"People from all over the city volunteer. We get kids from the Jewish day schools. They come in groups. Families come in," she said.

In addition to volunteers, Cooper said the committee also needs cash donations.

"With the money that we raise, we're able to purchase exactly what we need... We have lost some grants across the board, like many others have, and so we are really reliant on the community and businesses. Our sponsorships came in, which was great, and now it's up to the rest of the community to help us bring this forward, because it really serves a need in this community."

Volunteers can show up on delivery day at 4700 Bathurst St. between 8:30 a.m. and 12:00 p.m.

Toronto teen elected BBYO int'l president

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Amanda Freedman, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, was recently elected international president of B'nai Brith Girls, BBYO's division for young women.

Freedman, 17, will serve at the helm of a 10-member teen board that will help chart the organization's vision for the coming year and provide leadership and support to teen leaders in local communities throughout the BBYO system.

BBYO is a 90-year-old pluralistic Jewish teen movement whose goal is to involve Jewish teens in meaningful Jewish experiences, by providing leadership and identity enrichment programs.

Freedman was elected Feb. 9 at BBYO's largest annual international convention in Dallas, Texas, where the theme was "Welcome Home – Every Jewish Teen, Anywhere." It brought together almost 2,000 teens plus hundreds of stakeholders from 20 countries for the weekend event.

"To be elected to BBYO's international board is such an honour. It means getting the experience to look at our movement through the widest lens, while also focusing in on specific communities that need our help," Freedman said.

"It means waking up every morning thinking of ways to improve our Jewish movement and working toward a brighter Jewish future, and going to sleep every night knowing that I have done something to ensure that Jewish youth are connected to their Judaism to make us a stronger people."

Amanda Freedman

As international president of B'nai Brith Girls, Freedman will travel to communities across North America and overseas as an ambassador of BBYO. She will work with the network of regional presidents and act as a liaison between the teens and staff of BBYO serving on the international board of directors.

"I will be able to convey the teen perspective to help give them the best experience possible," she said. "I will get to work with the rest of the international teen board to implement new initiatives, set up foundations for the future, and overall, spend the next year doing everything we can to make BBYO the best movement it can possibly be."

For the 2014-15 term, BBYO is planning to work alongside other Jewish youth movements, Freedman said. She will have the opportunity to meet the international presidents of these movements and work with them to achieve the common goal of a stronger Jewish future.

Freedman said she's been involved with BBYO since she started high school. She initially joined the organization because her mother had been in BBYO when she was a teenager in Tulsa, Okla. Freedman's older brother, Jesse, was also very involved with the organization and, at the time, was the newly elected regional president.

"Initially, I was reluctant to go to BBYO because unlike Jesse, I attended Jewish day school and I didn't think BBYO would be a different Jewish experience. But I really owe my brother a big thank you for pushing me to go, because BBYO has given me more than learning Hebrew and studying Torah in school could."

Freedman has been an active member of BBYO since she joined. "I was inspired as a young ninth grader to take a step into leadership and run programs for both my chapter and my region, and I loved the experience of running programs so much that during Grade 10, I served as my chapter's s'ganit (vice-president of programming)."

Throughout that term, Freedman said, she noticed what her chapter did well and where it needed improvement, so she decided to run for chapter n'siah (president). She held this role throughout her Grade 11 year and was further inspired to become regional n'siah in Grade 12.

"BBYO has given me a community, a network, a family and a home. It has given me the opportunity to meet Jews from all over the world, and taught me that even Jews from different backgrounds all have one thing in common that unites us. BBYO has helped me understand that I am a part of something much greater than myself – the global Jewish community, and shown me that when Jews from all walks of life come together, we have the power to change the world."

Freedman said she used to be afraid to run for student council because she never thought she would do a good job, but BBYO changed her outlook.

"BBYO inspired me to take a step into leadership by doing something as simple as running one program, and it was that act that ignited passion in me to make a difference and inspired me to get involved. I have gained confidence in myself and my abilities to make an impact through BBYO, and I have been able to personally inspire others to get involved, which to me is the greatest impact I can make."

Lev Tahor

Five girls stage hunger strike on return to Canada

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Five Lev Tahor youngsters who were returned to Canada from Trinidad were hospitalized last week as a result of a hunger strike, according to a member of the ultra-Orthodox community.

The "five kids" are refusing to eat "until they are reunited with their beloved parents," said Miriam Helbrans, a mother of three who lives in the community.

Helbrans, the daughter of the group's rabbinic leader, Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, said two children were taken by ambulance to hospital from a north Toronto home where they had been placed by child welfare authorities.

The five were part of a group of youngsters apprehended in Trinidad and flown back to Toronto. They were fleeing a Quebec court order, enforced by an Ontario judge, which ordered them removed from their families over fear they could come to harm.

In Guatemala, another group – two parents and their six children – have reportedly applied for refugee status.

And in another development, an Ontario court agreed to release documents that had been under a publication ban. The documents include allegations of sexual abuse, beatings with crowbars, belts, whips and a coat hanger, as well as removal of children from their parents as a disciplinary measure. None of the allegations have been proved in court.

Six children – four from one family, two from another – along with the adults accompanying them were brought back to Canada from Trinidad on an official government jet, said Uriel Goldman, a spokesman for Lev Tahor.

According to a CBC report, Trinidad Attorney General Anand Ramlogan said the youngsters were detained when authorities learned they were not traveling with their parents and authorities were concerned over human trafficking, child prostitution and other factors.

However, Nachman Helbrans, another spokesman for Lev Tahor, said four of the children stopped in Trinidad were with their parents and the other two were travelling to Guatemala to join their parents. The parents, American by nationality, appeared at the U.S. Embassy to ask that their children be sent to them.

Meanwhile, CBC News reported that Canadian authorities had asked the Guatemalan government to help locate the Lev Tahor family. They are reportedly staying in the tourist town of Panajachel, a few hours west of Guatemala City.

Uriel Goldman

Another Lev Tahor member, a 17-year-old girl, was apprehended in a motel in Calgary with her baby, and flown back to Toronto. "We know she's in Toronto in one house, and the baby is in another house, five minutes away," Goldman said.

Goldman said the flights from Trinidad and Calgary were both on Shabbat. "Why not respect the religion?" he asked. "It's Canada, not [North] Korea. They don't know it's Shabbat?"

Goldman said Lev Tahor is being subjected to "psychological warfare."

"For no justification [child welfare authorities] come every day on fishing expeditions. That's what they're doing for the last two years," he said.

"It's lies, fear. It's just a tactic to break the family. Any family in the world, if they watch them for two years, they'd find a case.

"We're human beings, not robots. Sometimes we make a mistake," Goldman said.

Earlier, Denis Baraby, director of Quebec's department of youth protection for the Laurentians region, said he would ask for the removal of all children in the Lev Tahor community, which number some 250 individuals.

"I think the community is preparing a mass move," he told the Gazette in Montreal. "If we want to protect the children that are in the community, we need to start working on the exit of the 114 other children."

Baraby also said police and Crown prosecutors were preparing criminal charges against the guardians of the children who took them out of the country, the Gazette reported.

Goldman said "those people who left, I cannot talk on their behalf." But non-Lev Tahor members have told him they understand why parents would flee rather than lose their children.

The allegations against them are not true and there are no substantiated allegations against the rest of the community that would warrant the removal of all their children, he maintained.

Goldman said Quebec child welfare authorities want to destroy the community. Speaking in their voice, he said, "you cannot run away. We have to get you down. Your children are not sleeping at night because they're afraid. Who cares? They're just dirty Jews.

"This is normal?" he asked. "This is hate."

"We feel exactly like 1939 Berlin."

The Lev Tahor case is being watched around the world. One observer is former Montrealer Bernard Fryshman. A professor of physics at the New York Institute of Technology, Fryshman said he has been following the group's travails ever since its spiritual leader, Rabbi Helbrans, was charged in New York with kidnapping a teenage boy. He called Rabbi Helbrans' 1994 conviction in the case a miscarriage of justice, since he said the rabbi was trying to protect the boy from abusive parents.

As for the threat that Quebec is considering apprehending all Lev Tahor children, Fryshman said, "This kind of wholesale removal of children is a scary thing. If a child is being abused and you harm the child, that's what Children's Aid is for."

But to remove all the children, "that's scary. That's shocking. That should arouse all civil liberties groups."

Fryshman, who is affiliated with the Orthodox Agudah community, said civil rights organizations "should be at the government's door saying this is not the way a government should behave. These are human rights, fundamental freedoms.

"There's something scary in a government taking 127 children from a community. There's no precedent for that in any democratic society."

He suggested the government of Quebec wants to be seen taking a harsh stand against a religious minority.

"They want to set a precedent that they are harsh on religion," he suggested. •

Baraby's office would not comment on the case.

Program promotes coexistence

"We lived in the same cabins, we slept in the same cabins, which was another adventure, if I can call it that, and it was really interesting and beautiful how you got to know people around you that lived really close to you for three weeks.

"If we can compare it to life, it's a really short period of time, but it still had a very, very significant impact on our thoughts and our way of living and our way of seeing things. We did see a lot of things through each others' eyes."

During a speech to the National Council of Jewish Women late last month, Medlij spoke about an incident she and her fellow campers were able to resolve in a way that left both the Jewish and Arab participants feeling respected.

She said that last year, Camp Shomria commemorated its 100th anniversary, and during one celebratory event, the campers were asked to form a circle to sing Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem.

"I took a step back out of the circle, because I don't want to be part of it, and I don't think it speaks to me at all... Other Arab members of my group sat on the floor out of the circle," she said.

"The next day we had a conversation and... everyone expressed his point of view, and the reason behind doing what they did. We also listened to those who were objecting to what we had done. As a result, we came up with a compromise that we do have the right to leave the circle and not be part of singing the national anthem... but on the other hand, we do not have the right to sit on the floor, since it might be considered as disrespectful by the Jewish members of the group or for those who look at Hatikvah as something really important and means a lot to them."

Medlij said she felt that this discussion and compromise was a perfect example of the ways Palestinian and Jews can live peacefully with each other, in spite of their differences in beliefs and culture.

"This program had a very good and huge impact, in my opinion, on myself, and it also had an impact on others in my group. Thanks to such programs, we will be able to tear down walls and stereotypes that we have in Israel between Jews and Arabs."

Montreal-area mayor to run in Mount Royal

Housefather seeks Liberal Party nomination

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Anthony Housefather launched his campaign to become a member of Parliament by slamming Premier Pauline Marois and her government for sowing the kind of fear he hasn't seen since the 1995 sovereignty referendum.

On March 15, the Côte St. Luc mayor officially announced his candidacy for the Liberal nomination in Mount Royal, which has been represented by former justice minister Irwin Cotler since 1999. Cotler, 73, said in February that he would not run in the federal election expected next year.

Housefather, an outspoken critic of Bill 60 – the Quebec values charter – and Bill 14, which would expand the French language charter, said the worry in the riding over the values charter and the outcome of the current election is acute.

"People are asking, 'Should I sell my house? Should I leave Quebec? Do my children have a future here?'" he said at a press conference held at a frozen yogurt shop in Quartier Cavendish.

Marois, he said, "lives in a fantasy world where an independent Quebec is perfect in every way… I think she's just off the wall."

Housefather vowed to "vigorously defend" the rights of the English minority in Quebec and to be "the voice of Quebec federalists" in Ottawa.

If the PQ is re-elected, especially with a majority, it will be a "huge issue" for the federal government, he said. "This provincial election will determine where this country is going."

However, he is counting on Liberal leader Philippe Couillard's "aggressive" leadership to stop this from happening.

Mayor of Côte St. Luc for the past eight years, Housefather, at 43, has 20 years of experience in municipal politics, initially serving as a Hampstead councillor before getting elected in Côte St. Luc. He is a past vice-president of the federal Liberal Party and was president of Alliance Quebec in his 20s.

Housefather was surrounded by all eight of his councillors, Mayors Peter Trent of Westmount, Philippe Roy of Town of Mount Royal, and Beny Masella of Montreal West. An endorsement from Hampstead Mayor William Steinberg, who was out of town, was read.

Trent called Housefather "scarily brilliant" and possessing exceptional "probity" and judgment. His councillors praised his ability to find consensus.

In addition, outgoing D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman, whom Housefather called a mentor, was on hand, as was English Montreal School Board commissioner Syd Wise, who read a message of "unconditional support" from chair Angela Mancini.

Anthony Housefather

Wise raised the conflicting feelings many Jewish voters in Mount Royal. He said he has been tempted to vote Conservative, but felt he must vote for "an eminent human rights activist" like Cotler.

When he heard Cotler was retiring, Wise said he thought this time he would vote Conservative to show his appreciation to Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his steadfast support of Israel.

But if Housefather does get the nomination, Wise said he would vote Liberal in 2015.

Wise and the EMSB are especially grateful to Housefather for his support of its project to reopen a high school in Côte St. Luc.

Asked for a comment on the growing support for the Conservatives in Mount Royal since Harper's leadership, especially among Jews, Housefather replied: "I'm pleased with the prime minister's support for Israel, but it should not be a wedge issue. We need both parties to support Israel.

"[Liberal Leader] Justin Trudeau has always been supportive of Israel."

Housefather continued that Mount Royal voters are also, in great majority, members of minorities in Quebec and ardent federalists, and Trudeau is better equipped to represent those interests than Harper.

"Justin Trudeau can speak to Quebecers, and he is the federal leader who has been most outspoken against bills 60 and 14."

Housefather thinks Harper should be supporting the provincial Liberals in the current Quebec election campaign.

The nervous mood among Mount Royal residents was underlined by Côte St. Luc councillor Dida Berku, who introduced Housefather.

"Never before have people felt so insecure," she said. "They are shaken by the political atmosphere. We need a strong leader to defend our rights."

Housefather said he expects the Mount Royal Liberal nomination meeting to be held in the "near future." No other candidate had come forward as of last week.

CIJA rejects PQ candidate's apology

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has rejected an apology from Parti Québécois (PQ) candidate Louise Mailloux, whom it has accused of anti-Semitic rhetoric, as inadequate and meaningless.

Mailloux, who is running in Montreal's Gouin riding for the first time, issued an apology March 15 after CIJA's accusation that she had spread "anti-Semitic propaganda" reminiscent of that of the Ku Klux Klan and neo-Nazi groups, notably for her claim that Quebec consumers are forced to pay a "kosher tax."

"She alleges a misunderstanding and refuses to basically recognize her views are not only offensive, but anti-Semitic in nature," said CIJA Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro.

On March 14, Premier Pauline Marois defended Mailloux, but said her views are her own and not those of the PQ.

She called her a respected academic who articulately espouses the PQ government's proposed charter of Quebec values.

"Her writings are eloquent. I respect her point of view. She supports our secular charter and I appreciate her support."

Marois added: "The Parti Québécois is not an anti-Semitic party. We have good relations with the leaders of this community and all the different communities in Quebec."

In a statement issued through the PQ, Mailloux said, "Over recent days, many things have been said about the comments that I made within the framework of the reasonable accommodation debate. Concerning my remarks on certain religious practices, I wish to say that I never wanted to offend or injure anyone. If that is the case, I apologize very sincerely."

Louise Mailloux

An ardent secularist and feminist, Mailloux has been a philosophy professor at the CEGEP du Vieux Montréal since 1980 and is an outspoken public intellectual. She is the author of La laïcité, ça s'impose and Une chartre pour la nation.

On March 13, CIJA condemned Mailloux for spreading "anti-Semitic conspiracy theories" before the campaign, and it wants her to clearly disavow them.

The organization is particularly dismayed by "repeated" comments – verbal and written – she has made in the past about a hidden "kosher tax," the charge that kashrut supervision adds to the price all consumers must pay for supervised goods.

It's an allegation that came up frequently during the 2007-2008 Bouchard-Taylor commission on the reasonable accommodation of religious minorities. Kashrut and halal continue be debated in the province's media, with critics claiming it inflates prices or is animal cruelty.

CIJA cites an article Mailloux wrote in L'Aut'journal and a 98.5 Radio interview with Benoît Dutrizac two years ago, in which she claimed that kosher certification, which has become commonplace among products sold in any supermarket, is enriching rabbis.

She has elsewhere suggested that the proceeds from kosher and halal certification fund religious wars.

"According to Mailloux, kosher certification is a 'rip off', 'robbery' and a 'tax' paid 'directly… to the synagogue' unbeknownst to Quebecers," Del Negro said on March 13, "…thereby contributing to unfounded resentment toward Quebec Jews by their fellow citizens."

The so-called kosher tax is an "urban legend… unbefitting of a major political party," he said.

Although Mailloux's views were well known when Marois unveiled her candidacy March 8, CIJA issued its denunciation after Mailloux stood by them in a brief interview published by La Presse on March 13.

Asked if she takes responsibility for all her past statements, Mailloux responded, "Absolutely."

These opinions include comparing circumcision and Christian baptism to rape.

However, she refused to elaborate, saying: "At the present time, I am in the Parti Québécois to defend the secularism project. That's what interests me."

After Marois' comments, CIJA spokesperson Eta Yudin said, "We invite [Marois] to take a deeper look at what Mailloux has said in the media, not just her academic texts. She had the opportunity to distance herself or re-interpret those comments, and did not."

CIJA had called on the PQ to "debunk the myth of a 'kosher tax'."

Meanwhile, the PQ withdrew the candidacy of another candidate last week because of his posting of anti-Muslim imagery and comments on social media. Jean Carrière, who was running in east end Montreal's LaFontaine riding, was dropped after he posted on his personal Facebook page a picture of a topless woman giving the finger with the caption "F--- Islam" and a comment that "Islam is… female genital mutilation."

IsraAID director visits Eastern Canada

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

Navonel (Voni) Glick

HALIFAX — Since he became program director of IsraAID in July 2011, Navonel (Voni) Glick has supervised planning and implementation of humanitarian projects in Japan, south Sudan, Jordan, South Korea, Haiti, Kenya, the Philippines and the United States. He's been emergency response leader in the latter four.

However, he spent the week of March 3, spreading the word about IsraAID in Eastern Canada, speaking to university and community groups in Fredericton (University of New Brunswick), Sackville N.B. (Mount Allison University), Wolfville N.S. (Acadia University), Halifax (Dalhousie and Saint Mary's universities) and St. John's Nfld. (Memorial). He concluded a Canadian swing with a couple of days in Toronto last week before returning to his Tel Aviv base.

"IsraAID is an apolitical, non-profit organization, existing without any government funding. It was founded in 2001 and registered in 2007 to respond to crises at major humanitarian disasters," he said in a Halifax interview.

IsraAID's main fields of expertise are capacity building in mental health care, responses to gender-based violence, youth empowerment, and professional training. It has operated in 22 countries

"We're supported mostly by the Jewish federations of Canada, specifically Toronto, but also receive funding from other federations in North America, plus private and family foundations and corporate sponsors," Glick said.

"Our annual budget is about $1.5 million, a very low percentage of which goes to administration and the rest to programming and development."

Glick, 27, is a dual Canadian-Israeli citizen and speaks four languages – Hebrew, English, French and Nepalese. He was born in Israel but has lived in France and India, studied at McGill University in Montreal, and worked for four years in Nepal with Tevel B'Tzedek, an Israeli development organization, prior to starting with IsraAID.

"I was drawn back to Israel to IsraAID to help others in this world," he said. "As program director, I co-ordinate projects, work with our country directors (where a disaster has happened) and oversee budgeting and accounts. When something happens, though, I'm usually first out, along with our medical team."

The first few days are critical when a disaster occurs, he stressed. "We're usually there in three to four days, but we want to advance that to one or two because those days are crucial. From each disaster, we appeal to our donors for funds and need to ensure we have enough to get started immediately, rather than waiting even an extra day or two."

He said people in stricken nations are aware Israel is participating in a meaningful way.

"Only in Jordan, have we kept a lower profile because we're assisting Syrian refugees there. Jordan knows about us, but the Syrians don't, because we're concerned they might be targeted for receiving food and supplies from Israel."

He said most countries respect IsraAID, because they recognize the Jewish state as a success story that built itself and is trying to help them re-build.

Glick spent a week in Haiti prior to his Atlantic Canada speaking tour, reviewing what IsraAID is doing in the earthquake-ravaged country.

"We were there (in 2010) more quickly than many other countries, setting up schools, rehab clinics, trauma centres, and eventually doing long-term community development that's still going on."

He said agriculture has been a major initiative, bringing Israeli technology and expertise in drip irrigation to encourage more efficient use of water for farm growth. "We've trained farmers, set them up with buyers for their product, and they are now close to independence."

Glick said he's satisfied and privileged to work in this field and "humbled by the people I meet in these countries.

"Disasters bring out the best and worst in people. You see the high of incredible selflessness and willingness to help and then the low of pain and desperation. It's a constant emotional up and down, with no end to the 'coulda, woulda, shoulda' questions you ask yourself."

Coyotes' veteran looks forward to playoffs

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Nothing sets off Jeff Halpern's passion like a discussion about hockey.

But when the conversation, focusing on many years in rinks across the National Hockey League, suddenly turns to whether he's nearing the end of his career and his future plans, there's a slight hesitation in his voice.

Halpern pauses a bit to contemplate a reply.

"I'll play as long as I can – I just love the sport too much," he said in a telephone conversation from Arizona, where he plays for the Phoenix Coyotes. "I still have something to contribute, trying to enjoy each year, but I'm aware everything comes to an end and will deal with things when they happen."

Halpern is the oldest Jewish player in the NHL, and now, at the age of 37, his numbers aren't what they used to be. At the break for the Winter Olympics, the six-foot, 200-pound forward had two goals and six assists in 45 games.

Those stats are far from the days when he entered the NHL in 1999-2000 – his first of two stints with the Washington Capitals – when he scored 18 goals, followed by 21 a year later.

Halpern has had a solid pro career, mostly as a defensive forward and penalty-killer, playing 13 seasons in Dallas, Tampa Bay, Los Angeles, New York and Montreal.

The Potomac, Md.-born Halpern was captain of the U.S. national team at the 2008 World Championships.

He started skating at the age of three, taught by his father with help from an older sister, and became hooked on hockey at the age of four. More than three decades later, with the end of his playing days in sight, Halpern is contemplating a coaching career.

"It would be nice to coach, likely on the professional level, but I have to find the right place and enjoy it," said Halpern who, in past, indicated he would like to run youth hockey clinics.

A graduate of Princeton University, Halpern has something in common with Justin Bieber. The Canadian singer and songwriter was born in Stratford, Ont., and Halpern started his hockey career in the same city, playing for the Stratford Cullitons during the 1994-95 season, piling up 83 points in 44 games in the Ontario Hockey Association.

The Greater Washington Jewish Sports Hall of Fame added Halpern to its list of celebrities when he played for the Capitals, the team he grew up watching.

In 2005, the same year his mother, aunt and uncle were killed in a car accident, he chose to sit out a game against the Carolina Hurricanes to observe Yom Kippur.

"Judaism is important to me and our kids are raised Jewish," said Halpern, who married Kelley Cornwall, a former cheerleader with the Washington Redskins, a few years ago. Cornwall converted to Judaism.

Jeff Halpern

Halpern, whose great-grandmother was a Holocaust survivor, grew up in a Conservative home and celebrated his bar mitzvah at B'nai Israel Synagogue in Rockville, Md. He takes pride in his heritage and Jewish background, and despite strong athletic ambitions as a multi-sport youngster, he had to juggle his time to include religious school and hockey practices.

"I appreciate what I have been taught and the strong sense of tradition," said Halpern.

"As a kid growing up, it was always looking for an opportunity, trying to get to the next level and maybe a scholarship," said Halpern.

"My high school didn't have a hockey team, so I had to transfer to a prep school in New Hampshire."

As for his hockey career highlights and regrets, Halpern looks at the professional game and is realistic and diplomatic.

"Maybe it was my first game in the NHL, but I think my highlight has yet to come," said Halpern, who admits to being his biggest critic. "I hope it's a long and memorable playoff run. What I want to avoid is second guessing myself."

Halpern, who was undrafted, is one of a growing number of Jewish pro hockey players playing in the NHL and in leagues around the world. In Canadian, U.S. and European universities, the numbers are also on the rise.

"Playing in the NHL is such a special place, you dream about it as a kid," said Halpern. "I have had many opportunities and the challenge is always to keep getting better."

Cyclist rides to publicize mental illness

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Danielle Berman's dad had a passion for cycling. And this summer, Danielle will ride almost 4,300 kilometres in his memory.

Berman's father, Dr. Les Berman died by suicide in 1999. This July, in a trip she has dubbed Ride Away Stigma, Berman, will ride from Vancouver to Hamilton to encourage open discussion about mental health and reduce the stigma of mental illness. She also plans to raise $60,000 for St. Joseph's Healthcare Hamilton, the Suicide Prevention Community Council of Hamilton and the Canadian Association for Suicide Prevention.

"My dad loved cycling and the outdoors and adventure," said Berman, 27. "I thought it was the perfect match to combine what he loved to do with what helps me when I'm struggling with my mental health."

Berman, who will be riding 80 to 120 kilometres a day, is in daily contact with her bike coach. Her training includes core workouts and one- to four-hour bike rides, which she willramp up in the spring.

She will start her ride in mid-July and plans to return to the Dundas Driving Park in Hamilton, Ont., on Sunday, Sept. 7, a few days before World Suicide Prevention Day.

Berman grew up in Dundas. Her father had moved there from South Africa in 1975, and later started a sleep disorders and respiratory health centre.

He had a passion for adventure. Berman remembers a lot of family camping trips and travelling.

"He had a great sense of humour and would have me laughing all of the time," Berman said. "He was so caring and loving. I also remember him encouraging me to do things outside my comfort zone.

"I am definitely doing that a lot this year."

Her father died in 1999 when Danielle was 13.

"I knew how he died, but I wasn't ready to believe he chose to leave," she said. "I held on to the belief for a long time that it was an accident. It was a long time until I was able to comprehend that he was so hopeless that he couldn't see any other option."

In Grade 11, Berman started experiencing depression.

"I felt so alone. I was hiding it, and I had a fear of being judged if my friends knew what was going on. I knew I was in this darkness, but I didn't understand it, because everything in my life was going well. Luckily, my mom recognized it and encouraged me to seek help," Berman said.

"As I started to open up to friends and family, I was fortunate. I was well supported by friends and family. But it's not like that for everyone unfortunately. As a social worker, I see how much stigma stops people from getting treatment or opening up to friends and family."

Berman is doing well these days, but she makes sure to have supports in place, such as exercise and being with nature.

Along the ride, she will hold events in various communities and will regularly update her blog and social media sites. Events will be listed on her website.

To make a donation or for sponsorship information, visit rideawaystigma.com. Funds will be divided among the three charities. Berman hopes to finance her travel costs with the help of sponsors.

"I wanted to do something where people would see my dedication. I am investing the time to train and ride," Berman said. "People can see how important this cause is to me. My hope is for them to start talking about mental health and seeing it in a new light. It is not a choice. It is an illness that can happen to anyone."

CJPAC holds annual shmoozefest

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

CJPAC's Action Party feels less like a political event and more like a fun night out – and that's exactly the point.

The annual gathering of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, which took place March 6 at Ryerson University's Mattamy Athletic Centre (a.k.a. the former Maple Leaf Gardens), offers young professionals a chance to mingle with a who's who of Canadian politics.

"Very few Canadians participate in the political process by joining a party, volunteering on campaigns or supporting candidates," said Mark Waldman, CJPAC's executive director. "At Action, we hope to show our community members how easy, accessible and fun becoming engaged in the political process can be."

Waldman says this year's party was the best to date, attracting a record sold-out crowd of nearly 1,400 guests. That number included 60 elected officials in addition to candidates.

"We were thrilled to see so many young professionals and elected officials mingling and getting to know each other throughout the evening," he added.

"Truly, this is what Action is about – building new authentic relationships between community members and political leaders from across the spectrum and deepening existing ones."

This motto has been drawing politicians of all stripes and levels to CJPAC's annual shmoozefest for years. This year's event was no different: Tony Clement, Olivia Chow, Kellie Leitch, Joe Oliver, Mark Adler, Irwin Cotler, Michael Chan, Tim Hudak and Josh Matlow were just some of the MPs, MPPs and city councillors in attendance.

Another notable party guest was Toronto Mayor Rob Ford, who quickly became the centre of attention and took dozens (if not hundreds) of photos with partygoers. Additionally, the event attracted a number of prominent Toronto mayoral candidates, including John Tory and Karen Stintz.

"The annual Toronto CJPAC Action is a fantastic event that I have attended for years," Tory said in a statement to The CJN. "It showcases the best and most socially engaged young professionals Toronto has to offer. As a strong supporter of the State of Israel and of Toronto's vibrant Jewish community, I look forward to the opportunity to engage with the next generation of Toronto's community leaders."

Like Tory, Thornhill MP Peter Kent has been attending the Action Party for a number of years.

"All organizations that have serious missions also need to have a social or recreational dimension, and I think that's exactly what the Action Party is," Kent told The CJN. "I've been to previous events here in Toronto and in Montreal, and it gives people a chance, across partisan lines, to dress up and have a good social evening without getting into the serious, important work that the organization's main mission is focused on."

One of the key differences this year was the location; it marked the first time the event was held at the Mattamy Athletic Centre, the former home of the Toronto Maple Leafs. The arena provided an ideal space for guests to network and greet one another.

"Our new location is a whole lot better," said Corbin Seligman, one of the event's four co-chairs. "Everyone's in one room rather than being all dispersed." (The 2013 event was held at the Arcadian Court in downtown Toronto).

Guests enjoyed hors d'oeuvres and drinks from three open bars located throughout the arena, as well as a DJ and a live band.

The party proved to be an ideal event for young professionals such as Adir Krafman, Israel co-ordinator at Hillel of Greater Toronto.

"I've met some people that I know and I'm excited to meet some people that I haven't met yet," said Krafman, 23. "There's a great atmosphere and I'm having a great time."

Waldman says the Action Party is just the beginning. His goal is to continue to engage young Jews through CJPAC's year-round programming.

"With a federal election in 2015, now is the time for our community to step up and get active," he said. "This year we want to train more election volunteers and provide more creative programming than ever before."

Israeli Arabs help to debunk apartheid myths

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Eight Israelis who identify as Jewish, Muslim, Druze or Bedouin were in Toronto last week as part of a program called WordSwap, hoping to get the last word on the Israeli apartheid debate.

Flown in by StandWithUs Canada, a non-profit, pro-Israel advocacy group, Orit Tepper, Rabea Bader and Muhamed Heeb told The CJN about the message they hope to send to students who are inundated with dishonest, anti-Israel rhetoric on campus.

Heeb, a 27-year-old Bedouin Muslim who participated in the WordSwap program when it ran for the first time last year, said he was happy to have another opportunity to tour Ontario universities to dispel some of the damaging myths perpetuated by Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) organizers.

"I wanted to meet the Canadian students and tell them the truth. Last year, I met a lot of students… I keep in touch with many of the students from last year, and this is one of my goals – to bring our image of Israel… Some did not know there are Arabs in Israel. A lot of people were surprised," said Heeb, a University of Haifa student who is obtaining his master's in public policy.

The WordSwap team travelled to the University of Toronto, York University, the University of Windsor, the University of Guelph, the University of Ottawa and Carleton University, where they held tabling sessions and engaged students in informal conversation, answered challenging questions and shared personal stories about their service in the Israel Defence Forces.

The Israeli-born Tepper, a co-founder of WordSwap who lived in Toronto from 1989 until 2005 and attended York before she moved back to Israel, said she understands how difficult it is for Jewish students to cope with anti-Israel rhetoric on campus.

"As a student at York… it was almost impossible to focus on my education. You were either indifferent to what was going on around you, or you took a stand and it affected your ability to learn and to focus on what you needed to focus on," she said, adding that she served as Hillel's Israeli affairs co-chair.

"When I went back to Israel and I started studying there, I didn't have any issues on campus. It was non-political. I studied with Christians, Muslims, Israeli-Arabs, side by side, and we never spoke politics."

She said although she returned to Israel, she didn't want to forget the Jewish students who still faced anti-Israel events on a regular basis.

"Our goal is not to focus on politics on campus. We answer questions, we learn about the students we meet and we share with them our experiences in Israel," Tepper said.

"We want people, who maybe haven't had an opportunity to meet an Israeli, an Arab-Israeli, or a Jewish-Israeli… to turn around and say, I have an Israeli friend," she said.

"Most of the people we talk to are people from the Middle East, from Yemen, from Saudi Arabia, from Syria, from Lebanon. To them, Israel is just an entity – they call it Little Satan – and when they meet one of us, they can't help but think, 'Well, you're not so bad.'"

Bader, a 23-year-old Tel Aviv University student studying for his bachelor's in computer science and economics, said he met a number of people at U of T who were shocked to learn that Arabs live in Israel.

"I said, 'I'm living proof,'" he said, going so far as to converse with them in Arabic to convince them further.

"I've travelled a lot, and I've been called [names] when they learn that I'm from Israel," said Bader, a member of Israel's 125,000-strong Druze community.

"I see how Israel is misrepresented in the media… They're accusing Israel of apartheid… and you know it's not true, but if you don't stand up and say it's not true, a lot of people are going to believe these lies."

Heeb and his fellow WordSwap participants attended an IAW event last week at U of T, where he said he witnessed first hand that IAW organizers aren't interested in dialogue.

"I asked them a lot of questions, but they didn't answer any of them. They wanted to boycott Ben-Gurion University, so I said, 'Listen guys, Ben-Gurion University has the most Arab girls, Bedouin girls, studying there, more than [schools in] Arab countries.' I told them I was from the University of Haifa. I'm Arab. I'm doing my master's, and my faculty would not be able to exchange the knowledge that we have. But they didn't answer [me]," Heeb said.

Tepper said that every time one of the WordSwap members took the microphone, organizers stopped recording.

"They censored them. A member of our group said, 'I'm an Israeli Arab, my grandparents have lived there, I've lived there, I have full rights, I've served in the IDF, I work in Tel Aviv, I don't face discrimination, so how can you say that if you haven't even been there?'"

Bader said he thinks the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement is "a joke."

"All I hear is propaganda, lies, and seriously, I thought they wanted to boycott Israel because they want peace, but they're not talking about peace… Peace or no peace, they're boycotting Israel," Bader said.

Tepper said she feels the majority of the Jewish community still doesn't grasp the seriousness of the situation faced by pro-Israel students on Canadian campuses.

"The Jewish community needs to realize what is going on. We need their support. We can't have just a few students carrying everything on their backs, and that's how I felt when I was at York. That we were working around the clock and we were by ourselves," Tepper said.

Firm threatens to pull funds over Windsor BDS vote

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. — A well-known Windsor engineering firm says it will withdraw a long-running work placement program for students at the University of Windsor (UW) if the university's student government endorses an anti-Israel boycott vote.

Richard Spencer, president of RC Spencer Associates Inc., told UW president Alan Wildeman in a letter that the boycott divestment and sanctions (BDS) referendum, which passed in an undergraduate vote earlier this month, is "an expression of anti-Semitism" and slammed it for singling out Israel.

Spencer, a UW graduate who has employed the school's co-op engineering students for more than 20 years, said he would "cease support" unless Wildeman intervened to prevent the endorsement.

In an interview, Spencer called the boycott "prejudice" because Israel was the sole country being targeted. "Why didn't they issue this against the Chinese… in Bangladesh where Joe Fresh is doing all kinds of things," he said.

The letter was swiftly condemned as "Islamophobic" by the Palestinian Solidarity Group (PSG), the campus organization which brought the vote, the first such undergraduate referendum to pass on a Canadian campus.

Spokesperson Mohammed Almoayad said the letter was filled with inaccuracies, was "crude," and "not very well thought out."

He pointed to one sentence that said, in part, that "the Muslim faith… promotes violence and hatred toward the Jews in the Middle East."

Spencer said he has received a lot of support from people in the community, including some "I highly respect."

The letter went viral on the university student engineering society's Facebook page. It sparked a heated online discussion and was later withdrawn.

Spencer said he's not anti-Muslim.

"If they want to come over and see who works for me, I've got every nation and every religion represented," he said.

The referendum passed 798 to 585 – UW has an undergraduate population of about 14,000 – but Wildeman immediately announced he would launch an investigation into complaints about how it was handled.

He also asked the University of Windsor Student Association to defer accepting the chief returning officer's report until the university completes its investigation, which the student council agreed to do March 13.

Wildeman called wording in Spencer's letter "totally inappropriate" because it "targeted one group of students."

Wildeman said he wrote Spencer and others saying students have a "legal right" to hold referendums and the university "could not stop them from doing that if it wanted to."

The BDS vote would only affect student government policy and not that of the university administration.

The referendum question called on the student government to commit to "divesting from companies that support or profit from Israeli war crimes, occupation and oppression."

Since the vote, the university has become a lightning rod for attention from around the world, with extensive international media coverage including in Israel.

Wildeman said he was probably "getting an email a minute from somebody in the world somewhere… on all sides of the issue."

He also said he has received many comments from alumni and benefactors, but no one has yet withdrawn funding or tangible support. "I think we're still at the point where a lot of people are wondering, waiting to see what's going to happen," he said.

The university has appointed Raj Anand, a lawyer and former chief commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, to conduct the investigation into how the vote was handled.

U of Ottawa groups launch Sabra hummus boycott

JTA

OTTAWA — Pro-Palestinian student groups at the University of Ottawa have launched a campaign to ban Sabra hummus from campus.

Sabra is partly owned by the Strauss Group, a foods manufacturer that the students allege financially supports the Golani Brigade of the Israeli Defence Forces, according to the New York Times. The students say the Golani Brigade has been accused of human rights violations by numerous organizations.

Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Palestinian Student Association are among the student groups involved in the campaign, according to the university newspaper, the Fulcrum, along with the community group Young Jews for Social Justice.

"We will be raising awareness amongst the student population, collecting signatures for a petition and encouraging students to individually boycott the product," Asma Basmalah, a representative of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, told the paper. The campaign coincided with the 10th annual Israeli Apartheid Week, which ended earlier this month.

Caroline Milliard, manager of media relations for the university, told the Fulcrum that the main objective of the institution's food services department is to provide healthy options at fair and competitive prices.

"The purchasing policy of our service provider is apolitical," she said.

'We were taught never to forget'

The answer repeatedly provided (as though a forgone conclusion): "Because we were taught never to forget."

Here we find the volatility of a communal narrative that has emphasized remembering above all else – so that we can scarcely recall what we are remembering, so that we make indelible marks on our own bodies, mimicking the gross actions of the Nazis, all out of the grave fear of forgetting. "Remember not to forget" (together with its close companion, "never again") is a limited, circular message that leads back only onto the act of memory itself. What trickles down is often an echo of horror and fear, lacking substance and purpose.

I want to remember my grandmother's smile; I want to remember my grandfather's love of Jewish song; I want to remember the cities in Poland in which they were born and where they were married; I want to remember the Yiddish language that they taught me. I want their love and their life to be my legacy.

My grandparents did not survive the horrors of the Holocaust and the murder of their families and communities to be recalled until the end of memory as "Holocaust survivors." They were people – good, hard working, resilient, with a desire to make a world a better place, to bring happiness to their children and grandchildren, with a love of Jewish tradition and community. I will not make "Holocaust survivor" their moniker, nor "never again" my vacant battle cry.

The directive of "never again"/"remember not to forget" has left my generation aimless. What do we do with this exhortation? Where do we go with this teaching? The emphasis on remembering and on pain has led some to a state of constant caution and many others instead to alienation and misinformation. And this turning away may be the greatest disservice we can do to those who survived and to those who didn't.

Yes, remembering is essential, but it is not an end in itself. We can be more than vessels of memory. We can do more than stomp around, pumping our fists in the air, shouting "never again" from our comfortable existence in Canada. I believe that my generation can do more than hold the story of the Holocaust for future generations. We can be agents for change and for healing, for connection and for creativity. We can be active, engaged members of the Jewish community and citizens of the world.

So, how do we facilitate this shift? There are many ways to take this memory and move it forward. For me, it is through arts and culture. For others, it may be through activism, education, informed philanthropy, and even the seemingly simple acts of listening attentively, building relationships or cultivating constructive conflict. Thankfully, I am not alone in prodding and attempting to transform some of the diluted messages dispensed throughout a lifetime immersed in Jewish schools and institutions. I have found like-minded people who inspire me in their rigorous insistence on confronting misconceptions, infusing daily discourse with complexity and writing a new, more nuanced narrative about modern Jewish experience.

Then let us shift the expression into a call to action: remember and connect, remember and know, remember and grow, remember and change.

Originally from Montreal, Evelyn Tauben is an independent curator, producer and writer based in Toronto with a focus on contemporary Jewish arts and culture.

Excavation points to early religious practices

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

One might think that a significant archeological find a few hours' walk from Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem would turn up artifacts we would recognize as Jewish.

But since the Judaism of the day was not what we know, the find yielded ritual objects that seem vaguely pagan, almost heretical by today's standards.

Shua Kisilevitz, the archeologist who was part of the team that excavated the site at Tel Motza, about seven kilometres west of Jerusalem, prefers the phrase "pagan Yahwism" to describe the religion of the era.

Shua Kisilevitz

Last December, Kisilevitz and three fellow archeologists announced what they called an "unusual and striking" find, unearthed in construction for a highway: the 2,750-year-old walls of a temple, along with a cache of ritual objects that included a pedestal decorated with lions and sphinxes, pendants, pottery and vessel fragments, and figurines – two human and two animal – that may or may not have depicted deities.

The dig provides "rare archeological evidence for the existence of temples and ritual enclosures in the Kingdom of Judah in general and in the Jerusalem region in particular," the team announced.

The uniqueness of the find is even more remarkable, the archeologists said, because of its proximity to the First Temple, built, according to the Bible, under King Solomon in 960 BCE.

But archeologists know little about the period's religious practices because there are hardly any remnants of ritual buildings from the era, according to Kisilevitz.

While more study is needed, the find provides valuable insights into what those rituals might have been, she told The CJN recently prior to her talk on the subject at the University of Toronto.

While those practices may seem strange and un-Jewish today, they were in keeping with the rules of the time, Kisilevitz said.

Previous excavations showed that Motza functioned within the royal administration of the Kingdom of Judah, she said. "It was very much connected to Jerusalem. [It couldn't] create its own religion. The people of Motza didn't wake up one morning and say, 'Oh we want to create something new.' They couldn't break off so easily."

The artifacts are important because they reflect a formative time for Judaism, she noted, adding they show that the ancient Israelite faith was not always centralized in Jerusalem and its practitioners may have used ritual objects now forbidden as graven images.

"There are all these presumptions we have which we project onto the early formation of religion," Kisilevitz said. "This temple finally shows us how the religion started out and what it really looked like at the time. They [were] doing what was common in the period."

The find also conforms to biblical accounts, which mention local religious precincts outside Jerusalem, she added.

And "Motza" is mentioned in the book of Joshua as a town in the tribal lands of Benjamin, which bordered Judah.

Kisilevitz, who works for the Israeli Antiquities Authority and is here for several months on an exchange with the University of Toronto, said the team does not know whether the human and animal figurines served a religious purpose.

The archeological team believes the temple at Tel Motza must have functioned before religious reforms enacted in the times of Kings Hezekiah and Josiah, which abolished all ritual sites outside Jerusalem and concentrated religious practices solely in the Temple.

Kisilevitz believes the artifacts do not conflict "at all" with modern understanding of Judaism. "We just have to change the way we think of the religion at the beginning."

Rabbi Asher Lopatin

Open Orthodoxy: 'Orthodoxy that is unafraid'

Ron Csillag
Special to the CJN

Rabbi Asher Lopatin is a leading proponent of "open Orthodoxy," a term coined by U.S. Jewish thinker Rabbi Avi Weiss in 1997 to describe a form of modern Orthodoxy that emphasizes Halachah, intellectual openness, a broad concern for all Jews and a more inclusive role for women. The open Orthodoxy movement has been attracting a growing following in North America and Israel.

Rabbi Lopatin, 49, is president of Yeshivat Chovevei Torah Rabbinical School, the leading modern and open Orthodox rabbinical school in the United States, founded by Rabbi Weiss and located in New York City.

Previously the spiritual leader of a synagogue in Chicago, Rabbi Lopatin is widely known for his commitment to fostering and promoting an inclusive view of Orthodoxy. He has been assailed by many in the Orthodox and haredi camps for promoting and engaging in dialogue with rabbis of other denominations, and encouraging interfaith relations.

Rabbi Lopatin will speak in Toronto on March 27 to help mark the fifth anniversary of the Toronto Partnership Minyan, a modern Orthodox congregation where women read from the Torah and lead certain parts of the service. He will speak at the Prosserman JCC (4588 Bathurst St.) at a dinner at 6 p.m. on "Using Non-Torah Ideas in Understanding Jewish Law," and at a dessert reception at 8:15 p.m. on "The Five Pillars of Orthodoxy."

The CJN interviewed him via telephone from New York.

What is open Orthodoxy and why is the time right for it?

I really believe open Orthodoxy is one focus of modern Orthodoxy. It's an emphasis of modern Orthodoxy, which itself is an emphasis of Orthodoxy, which is itself Judaism, really. Open Orthodoxy is really the reclaiming of the modern Orthodoxy of years ago, which is not afraid of the outside world and actually feels that connecting with the world around us allows us to be better Jews, allows us to learn better Torah, and that it's critical we train rabbis to be part of the world around us.

Now is a very important time for modern Orthodoxy, and it's a real test because we don't have the giant shoulders of Rav [Joseph] Soloveitchik to rest on. On the one hand, it's an amazing time for Orthodoxy. It's growing and thriving and is stronger than ever. On the other hand, that's why it's so important that Orthodoxy rise to the challenge of its responsibility to make sure we are serving all Jews and make sure that Jews are serving the world as well.

One of Orthodoxy's chief attractions is that it has never been particularly "open." Can open Orthodoxy stand on its own?

Well, open Orthodox is modern Orthodox. You could say "inclusive Orthodoxy" or "welcoming Orthodoxy." Or Orthodoxy that is unafraid.

Maybe you need a new name. "Neo-conservative," perhaps?

I'm happy with "modern Orthodox." "Modern." "Open." "Passionate." I don't think "neo-" has ever worked.

I think Orthodox Judaism has always struggled to be open to trends, and yet be very strong and inward-looking as well. It's a challenge, but if you look at some of the great rabbis of the past... the Gaon of Vilna was very much into mathematics and the importance of understanding the world. The Volozhin yeshiva, where Rav [Avraham] Kook learned, was very open to outside ideas. The key thing is, how do we process these ideas? Are we learning enough Torah? Are we confident enough in our Halachah and our traditions to process the outside world? How does it get us to think differently, to understand Torah in a more sophisticated way? But I don't think it's always been closed.

Years ago, the right flank of the Conservative movement broke off and became the Union for Traditional Judaism. Is that comparable to what you are advocating?

I'm very much against splintering and breaking away. I want to be together. I want to work very hard for our yeshiva to be very much part of the Orthodox world and the entire Jewish world. At the same time, we have to be committed to our principles.

Open Orthodoxy has been labelled [by the New York Orthodox newspaper Yated Ne'eman] as a threat to Judaism and "deviant." [The article last fall also said open Orthodoxy "is not Orthodoxy."] How does that language affect you?

Our movement is Orthodox. From what I'm seeing, I feel that there is a very vigorous discussion, but it's a much more respectful discussion than it was even six month ago. We're not afraid to ask questions and to look at the world around us and say it's not necessarily all bad. And maybe it challenges us to learn more Torah and learn it differently.

The mood is much more positive. I hope it remains vigorous and I hope the arguments continue. But I hope it's less of an attack and more of healthy disagreement.

You mentioned Rabbi Soloveitchik. He was among a group of rabbis who issued rulings forbidding co-operation with the non-Orthodox, especially in matters of theology. How do get around those? Do you ignore them?

There are many opinions out there as far as connecting with other movements and religions. My rebbe, Reb Ahron Soloveitchik, was very much against being on board with non-Orthodox rabbis. But that was a long time ago. Orthodoxy thought everyone was going to leave. No shuls were built without mechitzahs [partitions between men and women]. Times are very different now. I don't know what Rav [Joseph] Soloveitchik would say right now under the circumstances.

[The late] Rabbi David Hartman had a different interpretation of Rav Soloveitchik's view on theological discussions [with non-Orthodox]. Rabbi Hartman felt that if you were in a position of strength, then you could definitely have this kind of dialogue. But if you're in a position of weakness, then you should not do it. And I think now that if you ask people on the right and left of Orthodoxy, they would say Orthodoxy is in a position of strength.

So can you foresee a day when a Reform rabbi delivers a sermon in an Orthodox synagogue?

Rabbi Asher Lopatin

I'm not sure a guest rabbi would give the sermon, but they could definitely speak in an Orthodox synagogue. I have had non-Orthodox rabbis give divrei Torah at different times in the synagogue. I've been on panels at the synagogue with rabbis of different denominations. And I'm seeing co-operation in limited areas: Israel [being one]. So yeah, I think we can definitely see a time when a Reform rabbi will be invited to share Torah in an Orthodox shul.

Can you foresee the day your yeshiva ordains a woman?

I believe that the idea of ordaining a rabbi is a minhag (accepted tradition). We've had a lot of minhagim that have changed over the years. I really feel I want to empower women as much as possible. In some ways, this is an idea that should have been done thousands of years ago with Dvorah. So I'm very supportive of women taking on prominent roles of leadership in synagogue. It could definitely happen, that [Orthodox] women are ordained as rabbis.

How do you feel about women wearing tfillin?

[There is no] sweeping generalization that women should wear tfillin, because they don't have an obligation, and in general, there's no reason for them to impose this upon themselves. But if an individual woman feels she's ready for the responsibility of putting tfillin on, I believe the classic halachic sources would support her. Just like Michal, daughter of Saul, put on tfillin, and the Talmud says she was not rebuked for it.

Are you for us?

Israel throws Diaspora Jews a lifeline

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

We are in the midst of seeing a major transformation in the relationship between the State of Israel and the Diaspora. The "start-up nation" is thriving, something that can't be said about world Jewry. Waze, a traffic and navigation app for smartphones that was developed in Israel and was recently bought by Google for just over $1 billion, is one of many Israeli start-ups that have attracted the interest of foreign investors. Just a few weeks ago, Facebook purchased the Israeli startup Onavo, which makes mobile applications that allow users to track their cellphone data-usage plans. More significant than the more than $100 million Facebook paid is the fact that Facebook – whose founder, Mark Zuckerberg, donated more than $980 million in 2013, making him the leading philanthropist in the United States last year– will now open a research centre in Israel.

A list of companies with such centres in Israel would include Apple, Dell, EBay, General Electric, IBM, Intel, Microsoft, Samsung, Xerox, Yahoo and many more. More Israeli companies are listed on the Nasdaq stock exchange than those from any other country except the United States and China. Not bad for a country with less than eight million people. Long gone are the days when Israel was an economic backwater whose main export was Jaffa oranges.

While I generally stay far away from political analysis, it seems that hope for peace in the Middle East rests on economic partnerships between Israelis, Palestinians and Arabs, something that's already happening to a certain degree. Israel's technological know-how recently facilitated the passage of an Israeli motion at the United Nations dedicated to sustainable agricultural advancements for developing countries. This is only the third time in Israel's history that a resolution it introduced at the UN has passed. Astoundingly, 138 countries voted yes and 105 countries asked to co-sponsor the motion, while Arab countries (only) abstained. We must do our utmost to ensure that economics trumps politics, ensuring a brighter future for all involved (and placing economic considerations before political ones would greatly benefit Canada, also).

In addition to, and in no small measure as a result of this great economic growth, Israel is now home to about half of the world's Jews – quite a change from 1948, when only about five per cent of world Jewry lived there. With well over 50 per cent of Jews outside of Israel intermarrying, there is an awakening to the fact that we in the Diaspora need the support of the State of Israel more than Israel needs our backing.

The Israeli government recently announced that it plans to invest billions of dollars over the next two decades to bolster the Jewish identity of Diaspora Jews, helping and hoping to ensure the continued viability of a committed and knowledgeable world Jewry.

I was gratified to hear Foreign Minister Avigdor Leiberman, in addressing what he called "the most pressing issue on the global Jewish agenda… more pressing than any other issue, including the Palestinian negotiations or the Iranian nuclear threat," propose that the Israeli government should budget $1 million dollars a day, or $365 million a year, for Jewish education outside Israel. He called on Jewish leaders to provide matching funding. This fantastic investment opportunity would pay dividends for generations to come for Jews around the world.

Kosher wine: how sweet it was

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Could Rabbi Dov Behr Manischewitz know that one day his name would become associated with one of the largest kosher wine companies in the world? Or that his blackberry, elderberry and venerable Concord grape wines would convince generations that kosher wine could not compare with the finest that France, Italy or California have to offer? [http://bit.ly/kwine1]

Where did the idea that "kosher wine" equals "sweet wine" come from? According to the Kosher Wine Institute, "the poor quality of kosher wine is due largely to historical circumstance. The Concord grape, the only available variety for Jewish immigrants arriving in the New York area, is an acidic grape, which must be balanced with sugar to be enjoyed. Hence, sweet wine. Time passes, and compromise becomes tradition." [bit.ly/kwine3]

If extra sugar and Concord grapes don't make a wine kosher, what does? The rules surrounding the production of kosher wine are much more stringent than those regarding other kinds of kosher food. Only Sabbath observant Jews can handle the grapes and wine. In fact, no non-Jew can come in direct contact with the wine or associated machinery unless the juice has been briefly heated (mevushal) to between 80 and 90 C. [bit.ly/kwine10]

Does this process damage the wine? Google the topic and you'll find people with strong feelings either way. Wine/food consultant Bernard Kenner tasted two pairs of high quality Israeli wines, identical except two were mevushal and two weren't. His verdict: "Yes, the difference was obvious… Both wines were very good, likeable nose, dark berry flavours, good structure and finish, but the mevushal had an extra layer of tannins at the end that asked for more time to be put back into balance. [bit.ly/kwine11]

Jewish winemaking goes a bit further back than those Concord vineyards. But the late Israeli wine critic Daniel Rogov suggested that early kosher wines were nothing to write home about either. "Wines shipped to ancient Egypt were so bad that they had to be seasoned with honey, pepper and juniper berries to make them palatable… So bad were most of these wines that it was probably a good thing that the Muslim conquest in AD 636 imposed a 1,200 year halt to the local wine industry." [bit.ly/kwine12]

Jump forward a few centuries to the 1890s, and Baron Edmond de Rothschild felt the country's vintners deserved another chance. He built two large wineries, which would become Carmel Wines, Israel's largest. [bit.ly/kwine16] On this side of the Atlantic, Herzog Family's Royal Wine, based in New York, is known for its Kedem and Baron Herzog lines. [bit.ly/kwine19] Another well-known name, Schapiro's Wines, was founded in 1899. The company's motto was "wine so thick you can almost cut it with a knife." [bit.ly/kwine18]

And Manischewitz? Actually Manischewitz wine is not produced by Rabbi Dov Behr's B. Manischewitz Company. [manischewitz.com] That famous brand was purchased by the Centerra Wine Company in 1987, and it is produced in Naples, N.Y. [manischewitzwine.com] Take the real or virtual tour to learn more about the company's historic and unforgettable offerings like Concord Grape, Blackberry and Extra Heavy Malaga, "a specially sweetened fruity wine with generous mouth feel."

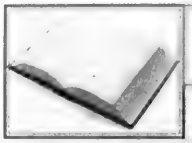
A Purim reflection to sober the hungover

Rabbi Dovid Heching



Rabbinic Reflections

Today, while Israel is flourishing with unparalleled advancements in countless fields, it finds itself the recipient of ubiquitous discrimination. From boycotts, both academic and financial, to incessant existential threats from its neighbours, we are reminded that we are still in the throes of a 2,000-year national exile. What's the secret to redemption? How can we return to our former days of glory when the flag of Israel was lionized by all?

Let's turn the clock back 2,300 years, during our first national exile, to a time when we faced a similar challenge in Persia. A familiar scene unfolded as Haman, the Jews' archenemy, sought to totally annihilate the Jewish nation – marking the first time since our nation was forged at Mount Sinai that Jews had been threatened with extinction. Ultimately, the Jews were saved, and three years later, Darius II allowed us to return to rebuild our Temple. What happened that led to this fortuitous return?

God's name is not mentioned in the Megillah of Esther, but if we follow the storyline with an actuarial eye, it is apparent as the "coincidences" pile one on top of the other that God is acting as the maestro. The Jews of Persia discerned God's hidden hand, and a national Jewish renaissance sprang forth as they reaffirmed their commitment to Jewish observance on an even deeper level than they did at Mount Sinai! Shortly thereafter, redemption was theirs. They returned to Israel.

This is precisely the message of Purim: by being able to discern what is really transpiring, we won't get distracted by the traffic of life. On its surface, Purim appears to be a Jewish costume party, a celebration that places the emphasis on outward appearance, but ironically, the true essence of Purim teaches that costumes are merely the medium that delivers the message: to look past the surface, delve deeper. We intentionally blur our unique exteriors, alerting us to push beyond what immediately meets the eye.

Our first exile was a result of laxity in observance and lasted only 70 years – we looked past the surface storyline and saw God. Our current exile is a result of divisiveness, passing impetuous judgments and the inability to overcome differences. Our ancestors in Persia taught us the secret. Whether between man and God or man and man, it is the mandate of every Jew to look deeper.

And as Jews we have always looked deeper. Whether it was to solve social dilemmas, to create technological innovation or to make major advances in all genres of science, we have tackled the most confounding problems by not settling for superficiality. Why can't we look a bit deeper and focus on the 95 per cent all of us Jews have in common, and overlook the five per cent where we don't see eye to eye?

Haman and our enemies throughout history didn't single out any one type of Jew, viewing us as one people, one tribe. If we yearn to see the day of our unified redemption in Israel, we must do the same.

Rabbi Dovid Heching is the director of Downtown Jewish, a Jewish education network on Bay Street in partnership with the Forest Hill Jewish Centre.

Jolt your community with JOFEE

From the Bimah
Rabbi Catharine Clark

Spring is almost here. It is time to add a jolt of green energy to your Jewish community with JOFEE – Jewish outdoor, food and environmental education. JOFEE is the integration of Jewish life with care for the environment, particularly through enjoying sustainably produced food and outdoor experiences. Program examples range from environmental bike rides and Jewish summer camps specializing in outdoor adventure to Jewish community centre gardens and synagogue community-supported agriculture programs (CSAs) in which participants purchase shares in a farm's produce for the season and pick up a weekly box of vegetables in return.

Seeds of Opportunity: A National Study of Immersive Jewish Outdoor, Food, and Environmental Education (JOFEE), a recent study produced by Informing Change, Hazon, a Jewish environmental organization founded in New York, and a number of Jewish foundations, shows the benefits of such programs to Jewish communal life.

Jewish communal organizations fretting over how to attract Jews in their 20s and 30s should be particularly interested in the study's findings. While adult participants in immersive JOFEE programs range in age from 18 to 84, more than 65 per cent are between the ages of 21 and 40. Moreover, JOFEE attracts the growing sector of Jews who are post-denominational, not identifying with (or belonging to and funding) institutions affiliated with Judaism's traditional denominations. Many of these participants are inspired by their JOFEE experiences to become Jewish communal leaders. More than 85 per cent of immersive JOFEE participants have helped organize a Jewish communal event, and two-thirds of them say that their leadership was influenced by their JOFEE experiences. JOFEE programs work in attracting and inspiring a coveted demographic.

Immersive experiences, such as a retreat over a long weekend or a multi-week training program in sustainable agriculture, might not fit into the calendar of your Jewish institution. Fortunately, JOFEE experiences need not be immersive to be meaningful, inspiring and fun.

Shoresh, a Jewish environmental organization in Toronto, partners with Jewish day schools, summer camps and synagogues to start organic gardens, run pickling workshops and lead environmental hikes in the city's outdoor spaces. Earlier this year, the JCC in London, Ont., hosted a Tu b'Shvat dinner featuring local foods and a presentation by an area farmer. Shaar Shalom Congregation in Halifax is planning an urban garden. Temple Shalom in Vancouver hosts a CSA in partnership with Hazon.

Programs like these can engage a wide range of Jews, but that's far from the only benefit to bringing outdoor, food and environmental education to your Jewish community. An environmental hike is a great opportunity to delve further into Jewish texts on caring for the land and one's own physical health. A synagogue garden with strawberry plants and apple trees can help children understand the difference between reciting a blessing praising God for creating the "fruit of the earth" and reciting one for the "fruit of the tree." Even better, produce from the garden can be donated to local organizations combating hunger and used for healthier kiddushes for the whole congregation.

Spring is almost here. Whether your Jewish community is a chavurah, synagogue, JCC or the whole population of Jews in one of Canada's small, vibrant Jewish communities, now is the time to start a JOFEE program.

Shimon Peres backs 'good partner' Abbas

Spencer Ho
The Times of Israel

Countering recent comments by Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon, President Shimon Peres praised Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as a serious peace partner while expressing hope for successful talks Monday.

"President Abbas is a man of principle, he is against terror, against violence," Peres said in a meeting with Congolese human rights activist Rose Mapendo. "He is a good partner, and I'm glad that our government is negotiating with him. Disagreements are normal, but we also agree on opposition to terrorism."

In an interview on Saturday, Ya'alon said there would not be peace in his era and decried Abbas as someone who is not a partner for a final agreement. He also implied that U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry had failed to act as an honest broker on releasing Israeli-Arab prisoners.

Peres's comments came while Abbas was in Washington for discussions with U.S. President Barack Obama on ongoing peace negotiations.

"Prime Minister Netanyahu had a good meeting with President Obama a few weeks ago and now we wait to see what will happen with President Abbas," Peres said, according to a statement released by his office. "It is in the interest of all of us to a find a way out of the disagreements; we're hopeful but concerned because there are crucial decisions to make in the coming weeks."

Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, Israel's top negotiator in talks with the Palestinian Authority, chastised Ya'alon on Sunday evening over his comments, saying "grumbling and despairing is easy... our responsibility is to change reality."

Peres continued to refute Ya'alon's words, albeit in a less direct manner than Livni, saying that both Israelis and Palestinians long for peace.

"Negotiations are difficult, and sometimes it seems as if there are only two options but often there are more, negotiations are a process of creation," he said. "We are all waiting for peace, it is the wish of the Israeli and Palestinian people."

Abbas is expected to discuss the U.S. framework agreement draft and the possibility of extending the July deadline for the talks while meeting with Obama later Monday.

He met Sunday with Kerry, who pushed him to work to narrow the gaps between the Palestinian and Israeli negotiating positions.

Johansson hails SodaStream, slams Oxfam

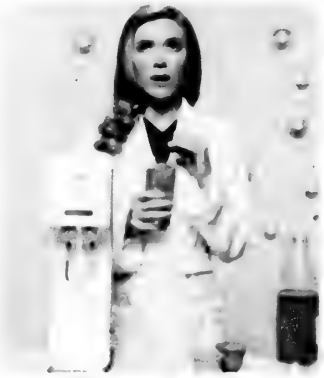
The Times of Israel

Actor Scarlett Johansson offered her most robust defence to date of her role as a spokesperson for SodaStream in an interview Sunday, and slammed the British charity Oxfam from which she stepped down as an ambassador.

Speaking to Britain's Observer newspaper, Johansson said of SodaStream's factory at the settlement of Mishor Adumin in the West Bank, which employs Palestinians, Israeli Arabs and Israeli Jews, "I'm coming into this as someone who sees that factory as a model for some sort of movement forward in a seemingly impossible situation."

As for Oxfam, which slammed her for her ties to the firm, Johansson said there was "something that feels not right" about "a non-governmental organization to be supporting something that's supporting a political cause." She said Oxfam had "funded a BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) movement in the past." (The Observer added that Oxfam denies supporting BDS against Israel.)

The actress was being interviewed by the Observer (the sister paper of the Guardian, its content appears on the Guardian website) primarily about her role as an alien in Under the Skin, a new sci-fi film, but the final part of the conversation revolved around SodaStream.



Scarlett Johansson in commercial for SodaStream (You Tube screenshot)

The interviewer did not mention in the article that SodaStream's West Bank factory employs Palestinians and Israeli Arabs, but was openly critical of Johansson for working for SodaStream, writing that "it looked liked she'd received very poor advice; that someone who is paid good money to protect her interests hadn't done the necessary research before she'd accepted the role and that she'd unwittingly inserted herself into the world's most intractable geopolitical conflict. By the time Oxfam raised the issue, she was going to get flak if she did step down, flak if she didn't. Was the whole thing just a bit of a mistake?"

Johansson was vigorous in her response, however. "I stand behind that decision. I was aware of that particular factory before I signed with it."

"Really?" the interviewer interjected, apparently surprised or disbelieving.

"Yes, and… it still doesn't seem like a problem," Johansson said. "Until someone has a solution to the closing of that factory, to leaving all those people destitute, that doesn't seem like the solution to the problem."

When the interviewer then told her that "the international community says the settlements are illegal and shouldn't be there," Johansson said: "I think that's something that's very easily debatable. In that case, I was literally plunged into a conversation that's way grander and larger than this one particular issue. And there's no right side or wrong side leaning on this issue."

Actually, the interviewer pressed on, "there's a lot of unanimity… about the settlements on the West Bank."

"I think in the U.K. there is," Johansson retorted.

The interviewer noted that the United Nations, the Red Cross, the International Court of Justice all agree the settlements are illegal and then she wrote, "Half of me admires Johansson for sticking to her guns – her mother is Jewish and she obviously has strong opinions about Israel and its policies. Half of me thinks she's hopelessly naive. Or, most likely, poorly advised. Of all the conflicts in all the world to plant yourself in the middle of…"

She then pushed Johansson on the Oxfam fallout, saying, "People saw you making a choice between Oxfam – a charity that's out to alleviate global poverty – and accepting a lot of money to advertise a product for a commercial company. For a lot of people, that's like making a choice between charity – good – and lots of money – greed."

But Johansson retorted with her critique of Oxfam for having supported a BDS movement in the past. "It's something that can't really be denied," she said.

Sunday's interview marked Johansson's sturdiest defence of her SodaStream role, but it was hardly her first such defence. Earlier this month, speaking to the London Telegraph, she said she believed in the company and praised its environmental record.

"I'm not an expert on the history of this conflict, and I've never professed to be," Johansson told the British newspaper in the interview. "But it is a company that I believe in, that I think has the ability to make a huge difference, environmentally."

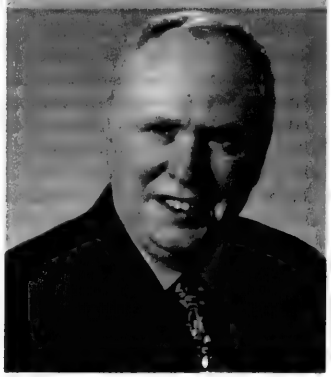
A clear vision in the Middle East



By Bernie Farber

If you have ever been to a sporting or community event, you may have seen the black and white uniformed St. John Ambulance volunteers. Those who have taken a first aid course probably did so under the auspices of St. John Ambulance.

There is, however, more to the Order of St. John than community volunteers and first aid – much more. In fact, St. John plays a role in bringing Jews, Muslims and Christians together in the volatile Middle East – but more on that later.

With a worldwide mission to help prevent sickness and enhance the health of people universally, the Most Venerable Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem (to use the full name) operates in major world centres through its two charitable foundations, St. John Ambulance and St. John Eye Hospital Group. From London to Hong Kong and Jerusalem to Toronto, the order's 300,000 volunteers and close to 4,000 employees have brought comfort to the afflicted and helped relieve sickness and disease in the four corners of the world. It is truly an organization without equal, respected by virtually all faith and ethnic groups.

Precisely for this reason, the Order of St. John is uniquely situated in both Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA), acting as a model of beneficence in a region more known for its strife than its open heart. And indeed, it's the lesser-known St. John Eye Hospital Group that stands out as a sea of goodness in a region fraught with tension and violence.

From its main location in east Jerusalem, and from clinics in Anabta, Hebron, and Gaza, as well as with mobile outreach, the Eye Hospital Group transcends politics to help a region where eye diseases are rampant and where some of the poorest people in the world live, offering them a chance to see.

With historical ties dating back to 1070, when the first hospice was built to care for travelling pilgrims, the Order of St. John has had a steady presence in Jerusalem since 1882, when it underwent a revival by Queen Victoria. Back in those days, as now, there was recognition that eye diseases in this desert region required special focus. As the Order explains: "The Palestinian rate of blindness is so high because of the very particular patterns of disease and demographics in the communities we serve. Movement restrictions and the erection of the separation wall are having severe effects on health and nutrition... [As a result of] a rise in consanguineous marriages, children are born with congenital diseases, including eye problems such as cataracts, glaucoma, retinal degeneration, optic atrophy, diabetic retinopathy and eye malformations. Indeed, there is often more than one child in each family with such a congenital condition, and children with eye problems are often hidden at home and not sent to school."

The State of Israel, recognizing the importance of the work undertaken by the Eye Hospital Group, maintains a very special and positive relationship. Even in Gaza, where clearly political relations are non-existent, St. John Eye Hospital is presently working with the Israel Defence Forces to have it relax its new ban on importing building materials so that it can begin work on its new clinic.

As well, the Eye Hospital Group is directly engaged in research with Israel's Hadassah Hospital, and at Tel Aviv University the orthoptics department's graduates work with St. John.

Sixty per cent of the hospital's funding comes from private donations, without which it would not be able to maintain its current level of care.

Today, it's more challenging to fund individual projects in the PA, even a hospital whose transparency is legendary and from which 94 cents of every dollar donated goes directly to helping the patient.

In 2013 alone, the eye hospital and its clinics screened more than 13,000 people, treated more than 114,000 patients and performed in excess of 4,000 operations. It has brought a sense of comfort, health and relief to many. By helping to create and maintain health, the Order of St. John also promotes peace, and this was recognized in 2012 when the St. John Eye Hospital Group was awarded the prestigious Gandhi Foundation International Peace Award. Clearly the work of the hospital is another tool helping to bring peace and health to a troubled region.

Bernie M. Farber, the former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress is now senior vice-president of government and external relations of Gemini Power Corp.

You can enjoy charoset after the seder, too

Rivka Tal
Special to The CJN

Scurrying and scrubbing, Jewish families all over the world are preparing the special seder plate used during the recitation of the Haggadah, the story of the Exodus. Charoset symbolizes the mortar and bricks in the Exodus story, and although it is delicious, it brings to mind the work done by the Israelites enslaved in Egypt.

Its basic ingredients are mentioned in the Song of Songs, where Israel is compared to apples, pomegranates, figs, dates and nuts. Red wine is almost always added.

Ashkenazi Jews – descendants of eastern European families – make an apple-nut-wine paste. The Sephardi customs practised by descendants of Spanish, North African and Turkish Jews incorporate other traditions, often using ingredients such as legumes, prohibited for their Ashkenazi cousins.

Traditional Yemenite charoset contains sesame seeds, dried dates and figs, ginger and dry wine, as well as hot peppers! Iraqi Jews, on the other hand, use a combination of almonds, walnuts and pine nuts. Moroccan-style charoset is made from chopped dates, pecans and almonds simmered together, then rolled into balls and sometimes wrapped in rose petals. Some North African Jews prefer a combination of pine nuts, hard-cooked egg whites, grated apple, sugar, ground almonds and walnuts, lemon juice, cinnamon and ginger.

At our house we serve two kinds of charoset: with and without nuts (for the children). When following any of these recipes, think about double batching, since leftover charoset can be enjoyed throughout the week of Passover as a side dish.

TRADITIONAL MIDDLE EASTERN CHAROSET

2 large coarsely chopped or grated apples
1/2 cup chopped nuts
1 tsp. cinnamon
sweet red wine

Combine apples, nuts and cinnamon. Add enough wine to bind the mixture. Cover and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

NORTH AFRICAN CHAROSET

2 oz. pine nuts
1 hard-boiled egg white
1 grated apple
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup chopped almonds
1/2 cup ground walnuts juice and zest of 1 lemon cinnamon ginger
sweet red wine (optional)

Combine all ingredients, adding cinnamon and ginger to taste. Add wine, if desired. Cover well and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

TURKISH CHAROSET

20 pitted dates
1 cup raisins
1 cup coarsely ground walnuts
1/2 cup chopped almonds
red wine

Combine all ingredients, adding wine as desired. Cover well and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

ITALIAN-STYLE CHAROSET

4 apples, peeled and chopped
6 cut-up dates
3 hard-boiled eggs
1 cup ground almonds
6 chopped walnuts
1/2 cup raisins
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/4 cup lemon juice

Combine all ingredients. Cover well and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

Easy Passover recipes – believe it or not!

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

Did you ever think the day would come when you'd hear the words "Passover" and "easy" in the same sentence? All that cleaning! All that fussing! All that cooking!

Leah Schapira, author of Fresh & Easy Kosher Cooking and co-founder of CookKosher.com, an online kosher recipe exchange, has teamed up with Victoria Dwek, managing editor of Whisk, a popular kosher food magazine published weekly by Ami Magazine, to produce Passover Made Easy: Favorite Triple-Tested Recipes (Artscroll), the first in the series of Made Easy cookbooks published throughout 2013 and 2014.

No, Schapira and Dwek won't help you with your housework, but you will find over 60 creative, doable Passover recipes to take you through not only the seders, but the week-long celebration as well.

Tired of gefilte fish and matzah ball soup? (Not that there's anything wrong with them!) Try unique starters like Brisket Eggrolls, Antipasti Rolls, or Roasted Tomato and Eggplant Soup. Apple-Jam Chicken Drumettes, Potato-Chip Zucchini Sticks and Matzaroni and Cheese are sure to please the kids. For seder, I'm choosing Braised Short Ribs in Homemade Duck Sauce, an easy, hearty dish you can make ahead so you can de-frazzle your preparation and enjoy your guests. And save room for dessert: Choose from Frozen Lemon Wafer Cake or Pecan Pie with Cookie Crust, to name just two.

First you eat with your eyes. All the recipes are accompanied by dazzling colour photographs with plating and styling tips.

Most appreciated in the book are the wine pairing suggestions. Every adult drinks four cups of wine at each of the two ceremonial seders. No wonder kosher winemakers consider this their busiest season.

Not so long ago, the words kosher wine brought to mind the syrupy sweet concoction served as an accompaniment to prayers, with your choice of blackberry or grape. Not anymore. Observant Jewish baby boomers, hipper and more sophisticated than their parents, have demanded the same selection and quality found in the non-kosher world, and kosher winemakers have taken notice.

No matter how elaborate, satisfying and filling the holiday meal, there's always room for dessert. No flour for a week? No problem! We Jews are a resourceful lot, necessity being the mother of invention and all. "Light, refreshing and lemony, Frozen Lemon Wafer Cake is the perfect dessert to finish off heavy holiday meals," notes Schapira.

BRAISED SHORT RIBS IN HOMEMADE DUCK SAUCE

You can also use this sauce over flanken, chicken or fish.

1 tbsp. oil
1 red onion, diced
6 tbsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. chopped fresh ginger juice of 1/2 lemon (about 1 1/2 tbsp.)

2 tsp. potato starch
1 cup orange juice
salt, to taste
coarse black pepper, to taste
3 lb. short spare ribs

Preheat oven to 300. Heat oil in sauté pan over medium heat. Add onion and sugar and cook, stirring constantly, for 10 minutes, until mixture is syrupy. Add ginger and lemon juice.

Dissolve potato starch in orange juice and add to pot. Season with salt and pepper. Continue to cook until sauce thickens, about 3-4 minutes.

Place ribs into a 9x13-in. baking pan. Season with salt and pepper. Pour sauce over ribs. Cover tightly and bake for 2 hours. When serving, pour sauce over ribs. Yield: 4-6 servings

Asparagus side dishes for Passover

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

The arrival of fresh young, local asparagus, a sure harbinger of spring, is often neatly timed to coincide with the Passover seders, as it does again this year. Fresh asparagus tends to start to appear mid-April to mid-May, when its shoots break through the farmer's soil and reach their optimal length of between 6 and 8 inches. Of course, you can buy asparagus all year round now, but there's a special place for it at the Passover table, where its bright emerald tones and snappy flavours help balance the richness of the meal's other components.

When you're at the grocery store, always look for stalks that are crisp, with no evidence of wilting, bright green and that stand soldierly straight. The tips should be dry, compact and closed and can range from a deep green to an almost purple colour. Steer clear of any that have open tips or are starting to sprout.

Once home, it's important to store asparagus properly, since if improperly stored, they will perish quickly. Simply trim ¼-inch of the bottom of the stalks and store upright in some water in the fridge. Properly stored, asparagus can be refrigerated for up to 3 days.

The easiest way to prepare asparagus is to bend each spear to where it naturally snaps and breaks. Then simply even out the tear with a knife. Of course, the most important thing to remember about this vegetable is that more is not better! Asparagus requires the briefest of cooking times, whether you're steaming, blanching, sautéing or roasting. Overcooked asparagus will become discoloured, mushy and stripped of many of its nutrients.

ASPARAGUS WITH GARLIC, GINGER AND CORIANDER

This flavourful side dish holds up well against a rich main course such as roast chicken or brisket. Even though its elements speak to an Asian background, don't hesitate to serve it with more mainstream recipes.

1 1/2 lb. asparagus, trimmed
3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
Topping
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
3 large cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. coarsely chopped ginger
1 tsp. ground coriander
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
2 tsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice

Preheat the oven to 400. Line a large, rimmed baking sheets with aluminum foil. Spread the asparagus evenly in a single layer on top of the foil. Drizzle with the olive oil and sprinkle with salt and pepper.

Roast in the centre of the preheated oven for 7 minutes or until bright green and tender crisp.

Meanwhile, prepare the topping. Heat the olive oil in a small skillet set over low heat. Add the garlic and ginger; cook, stirring occasionally, until very soft and fragrant, about 4 minutes. Stir in ground and fresh coriander. Remove from heat and let steep until the asparagus are ready.

Transfer asparagus to serving platter or bowl. Stir lemon juice into oil mixture. Pour evenly over asparagus. Serve immediately. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

ASPARAGUS WITH SHALLOTS AND ORANGE

Cooked oranges? You bet! Be sure to slice the oranges very thinly. If you still have access to blood oranges, try those too. They will be beautiful.

2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
6 large shallots, thinly sliced
8 very thin orange slices, cut into quarters
1 tsp. grated orange zest
1/4 cup orange juice
1 1/2 lb. asparagus, trimmed

Heat the oil in a large non-stick skillet set over medium heat. Add the shallots; cook, stirring occasionally, for 3 minutes. Add the orange slices; cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Stir in the orange zest and juice. Bring to a boil. Add the asparagus in one layer. Cover and steam for 3 to 4 minutes or until the asparagus is bright green and tender crisp. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Transfer asparagus to serving platter or bowl. Top with shallots and orange slices. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

ASPARAGUS WITH BRAISED RADISHES

The simplicity of this dish belies how much fabulous flavour it delivers. Braising the radishes mellows their natural bite and renders them the perfect foil for the snap of the asparagus.

2 bunches radishes (about 1-3/4 lb)
1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil or margarine
1/2 cup lower-salt chicken or vegetable broth
1 tbsp. sherry vinegar
1 tsp. granulated sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
1 1/2 lb. asparagus, trimmed and cut in half

Trim the radishes; cut into thick slices, about 3 or 4 per radish

Heat the olive oil in a large non-stick skillet set over medium heat. Add the radishes. Cook, stirring often, until they soften, about 5 minutes. Pour in the stock. Bring to a simmer. Cover and cook, stirring occasionally, until the radishes are tender-crisp, about 5 minutes. Stir in the vinegar, sugar and salt until radishes are well coated. Stir in the asparagus. Cook, stirring, until the asparagus are tender and bright green and the liquid is reduced to a glaze, 3 to 4 minutes. Transfer to a serving plate and serve immediately. Makes 6 servings.

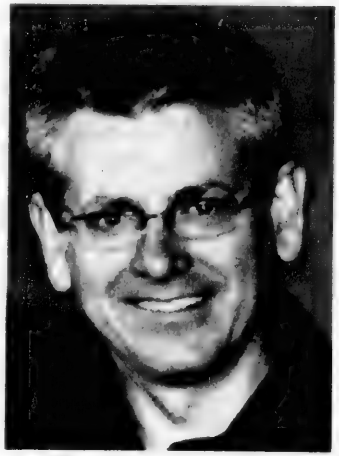
Cultural approach important in end-of-life care

Charlie Angus

In starting a conversation about palliative care, it's important to state that this issue isn't simply a matter of dollars and cents, although the financial benefits to the system are astounding. Palliative services save the health system an enormous number of resources, while providing higher levels of personal comfort.

Last fall, the New Democratic Party brought forward parliamentary motion, M-456, to create a Canada-wide strategy on palliative and end-of-life care, in conjunction with the provinces and the territories. There are many excellent organizations attempting to support families across the country, but they work in a patchwork manner.

Furthermore, what is often overlooked in this conversation is the cultural element. In the NDP motion on palliative care, the issues of family, cultural and spiritual elements are specifically mentioned. Nowhere is this connection better understood than in the work of groups like the Jewish Hospice Program run by Jewish Family and Child (JF&CS) in Toronto. They understand that providing support to the family in a culturally sensitive manner before and after death helps ensure death with dignity. It also helps a family pick up the pieces. Thus, an event that could have been traumatic can actually be a healing moment.



Charlie Angus

The culturally sensitive approach of groups like the JF&CS is rooted in the overall vision of Jewish federations to implement the concept of tikkun olam, repairing the world. While this principle is firmly rooted in the Jewish tradition, the practical steps taken by JF&CS can be utilized in many other contexts.

Access to palliative and end-of-life care is inconsistent in Canada, depending on the region. This is where the federal government can play an important role. Although health services are delivered at the provincial level, the federal government has a duty to work with the provincial and territorial partners on setting benchmarks and helping the delivery agencies learn from best practices.

In talking about a national strategy for ensuring the best practices for dealing with the dying, the work of JF&CS is a model for combining cultural, religious, and spiritual expertise as part of its counselling, care planning and volunteer support to clients and their families.

Yet, this issue never seems to make it onto the political radar, although more than 70 per cent of Canadians do not have access to hospice services. The costs to the medical system as patients are shuttled into emergency wards and families endure the wait for hospital beds are enormous.

What is needed to ensure that this palliative care discussion succeeds? First off, all federal parties need to state where they stand on the federal government's role in establishing a pan-Canadian palliative care strategy. The NDP is committed to making this a key element for dealing with health-care reform in Canada.

Getting all-party support, however, won't happen without the involvement of communities, individuals and health-care providers.

There is consensus among academics, health professionals, faith communities and the public, that Canadians deserve better end-of-life and palliative care treatment. The Jewish community, with its rich tradition of looking after the needs of its members, has a huge role to play in helping ensure that MPs of other parties understand the importance of ensuring that this consensus is reflected in Parliament.

Become part of the discussion. Ask your MP where he or she stands on this important issue. The time for the conversation on quality end-of-life care has come.

Charlie Angus is the NDP member of Parliament for Timmins-James Bay.

Solly (Rothgauz) Lewis

August 31, 1927- March 7, 2014

Solly lived a wonderful life, and his fighting spirit kept him strong and inspirational up until the very end. Eight-six years young-at-heart, and the husband of his beloved wife Elizabeth (Betty) of sixty-two years, Solly passed away suddenly, but peacefully with his family on March 7 2014, while visiting his birth city of London England. He and Betty, escorted by his loving sons Stephen and Paul Lewis, had gone to visit family and celebrate the Oxford & St George's Centenary celebration, where they met friends dating back more than 65 years. Solly, born on August 31, 1927 and dear brother to Hazel Harris, was predeceased by sisters Esther Barnard and Ruth Babot and brother Joe Ross. He started his working career in London's Petticoat Lane and then spent many years as a London Cabbie. Solly brought his family to Toronto on January 1, 1970. He worked in the textile industry in Toronto and finished his career at York Manufacturing. He will be dearly missed by his cherished wife Betty, sons Stephen and Paul, daughters-in-law Judy and Elise, grandchildren Jessie, Saul, Zoe and Hayley, his sister Hazel and the many friends and family members he kept in touch with around the world.

Israel re-brands with new holistic approach

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

More than a century ago, Theodor Herzl wrote a book in which he described Israel as an old new land. For the public, with its archeological digs and religious sites, Israel definitely conjures images of the old. The new, not so much.

But today Israel is a land that is trending, that tweets, that has hashtags. It's innovative and spunky. It's a place where you can go rock climbing, dance in a disco, dive with dolphins, and enjoy cuisine as fine as anywhere that side of Paris.

It's very much a place that is a world leader in all manners of innovation, so it was about time the country's pitch to tourists reflected that.

That appears to be the thinking of officials at that country's ministries of tourism and foreign affairs, who commissioned studies to determine how best to re-brand the country.

Last week, representatives of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) unveiled a new campaign aimed at updating and modernizing Israel's brand while taking into account its diversity and innovation.

The re-branding features the name Israel in colourful, custom-designed typeface, accompanied by the catchphrase, "Land of Creation." The new typeface, designed specifically for the campaign, blends elements of Hebrew, English and Arabic writing. Designers came up with more than two dozen variations, from which the Ministry of Tourism selected three for its marketing campaigns. Other ministries will select other options, but they are so similar, they will present a unified image of Israel.

"[The slogan] Land of Creation ties everything together," said Jerry Adler, PR and communications director for the IGTO.

"It doesn't just refer to Israel as a start-up nation," said Ami Allon, the IGTO's consul for tourism. "It's about culture, it's about history."

"It's about Israel as a whole," he continued. "Over the last few years we realized that the right way was to give a logo, a branding, that would create a whole, that would have everything within it."

The logo is not static – and neither is Israel. It's "a dynamic logo with one visual language that can be adopted by all government offices," said Adler.

"The new logo is part of an ongoing efforts of the government of Israel... to change people around the world's view of the country and its people," he added.

Jerry Adler

Ami Allon

It is expected the logo will be employed in future marketing and PR initiatives, collateral materials, Internet and social media presence, TV, radio or other forms of communication.

Even the logo with a much older vintage – that of a Bible scene in which two of the spies sent to Canaan by Moses carry back a massive load of grapes suspended on a rod – has been updated.

Variations feature the spies carrying a watermelon, a telephone, a heart, a sun umbrella, and even an ice cream cone, all on very colourful backgrounds.

The logos and the creative language were designed by Open, an Israeli firm, following market research by Saatchi & Saatchi England, which suggested the theme of the rebranding should be Israel's creative energy.

The colourful contemporary Israel logo and the phrase that accompanies it suggests modernity and innovation, said Allon. Another aspect of the new campaign focuses on the country's people – the faces of the country.

Saatchi & Saatchi was asked to provide its expertise in designing the most effective campaign, from the perspective of an outsider looking in. The company's market research showed that for visitors, "Israel was not only about the country. It is about the people within the country," Allon said. "So in the last campaign we not only showed the places, we showed the faces."

The goIsrael website, a portal into all things connected with travel to the Jewish state, employs a unique interactive video designed by Interlude, an innovative Israeli company. Visitors are guided around the country by a trio of native Israelis. Visitors to the site can choose which Israeli will show them around, and the video takes them to locations ranging from Eilat, where you can swim with dolphins, to Tel Aviv, where you can enjoy a great meal and finish the evening enjoying the latest in techno at a dance club.

"Israel is seizing on the dynamism of multiculturalism and using that," said Adler.

So far, in its first few weeks of operation, the interactive feature appears to be succeeding. "The average stay on the website is more than six minutes. It's a lot," said Allon. "It's far more than YouTube."

It's too early to say whether the re-branding campaign is working, he added.

But there is certainly some success to build on. Despite the turmoil in Israel's neighbourhood – unrest in Egypt, civil war in Syria – more than 3.5 million tourists visited the country in 2013. "It was a fantastic year, if you think what happened in our area," said Allon.

Of that number, some 70,000 carried Canadian passports. The number of visitors from Canada was likely 20 per cent higher than that, he suggested, since it doesn't include people traveling on non-Canadian passports, such as Israelis returning for a visit.

Canadians are valued visitors, since they spend $160 a day on average, more than most others. And 35 per cent are on a return trip.

"It means people who go to Israel feel they haven't seen enough," said Allon.

To increase awareness of the country as a vacation destination, the IGTO recently hosted five travel bloggers in Israel.

"We developed and launched an online Israel specialist learning centre for the travel trade," said Adler.

"Our plan for this year is to divert more budget into social media and bloggers, allowing us greater access to the mass market and hopefully succeed in changing opinions and reinforce the image of Israel as a world-class, modern destination."

North America is the largest and most important market for Israeli tourism, and, therefore, represents "the largest investment in advertising," Allon said.

There are many short-term visitors to the country, from cruise ships, Russia and even Egypt and Jordan. But in the last two years, tourists have been spending more time in the country, and "that means people are spending more money in Israel," said Allon.

No doubt attracted by the country's unique blend of the old and the new.

As cigarettes and books fade from view

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

Books v. Cigarettes
George Orwell.
Penguin Great Ideas Series

Our access to books is changing apace. In a big city like Montreal or Toronto, it is increasingly difficult to find a bookstore with enough stock to allow for a good, revelatory browse. Libraries are refocusing their attention on new forms of public space, new venues for "knowledge delivery," and consider moving book stacks off site.

Major book chains present, on the main floor of their landmark locations, not books, but household items – mugs, bath mats and candles. In the same way, the major online bookseller is awash in every product under the sun, while it follows the search patterns of book buyers in order to sell them pet food and appliances.

In Canada we think of the frailties of the book trade as being caused by our peculiar national economy and culture. For a few decades, beginning in the 1960s, the federal and provincial governments provided funding to programs that supported regional publishing. But much of this infrastructure has disappeared; American ownership of our large publishers is now de rigueur; a more-or-less monopolistic state exists in our book selling and distribution market; and the conglomeration of media ownership means that if a review runs in a major newspaper in Montreal, it will most likely fill space in its sister papers across the country.

It's astonishing to open George Orwell's collection Books v. Cigarettes, much of which first appeared in 1946, to find that trends we think of as of the moment were underway in Orwell's London, 70 years ago.

In Orwell's portrait of mid-'40s England he catalogues familiar woes. In the essay Books v. Cigarettes he comments on the prevalent notion that book buying is an extravagance, an overpriced habit. In his characteristically wry tone, Orwell computes his own book, newspaper and magazine buying costs to find that his expenditures in this area do not compete with his budget for Players cigarettes and a "half a pint of mild six days a week."

"I have said enough," he writes, "to show that reading is one of the cheaper recreations: after listening to the radio probably the cheapest."

I could not help thinking, as I read Orwell's tallying of his outlay on books and smokes, of an argument commonly expressed today to account for a preference for virtual books over the artifact previously known, simply, as a book: that is, that the former can be had more cheaply. How cheap, I wonder, when people say this, must a book be?

In an essay titled Bookshop Memories Orwell reflects on his work in a second-hand bookshop, mostly to characterize the precariousness of this sort of business.

Who does he highlight as his memorable customers at the shop "on the frontier between Hampstead and Camden Town"? There are the "not quite certifiable lunatics" who "gravitate towards bookshops, because a bookshop is one of the few places where you can hang about for a long time without spending any money."

Our big chains have borrowed a page from this scenario, creating living room-style nooks where customers flip through things they may or may not buy. Even the throw rugs and mugs in major chain stores are reminiscent of what London second-hand shops peddled to pay their overhead: "second-hand typewriters . . . stamps . . . sixpenny horoscopes . . . in sealed envelopes."

In Confessions of a Book Reviewer Orwell describes a literary predicament that is common today. The "standard of reviewing has gone down," Orwell tells us, "owing to lack of space." A possible antidote discussed at the time was that "a good deal of reviewing, especially of novels, might well be done by amateurs." Here Orwell is prophetic of the use by Amazon of homemade reviews as no-cost product promotion.

As one would expect from the author of Homage to Catalonia and 1984, Orwell is concerned about the rarity among his contemporaries of engaged writing that is free of a party line. In 1946 when he published The Prevention of Literature, Orwell recalled the previous decade, when a Soviet mythos held sway over English intellectual life, and accounted for an unwillingness to speak or write forthrightly about pressing issues "like Poland, the Spanish Civil War, the Russo-German Pact" and the "twenty months" during which Hitler's pact with Stalinist Russia held.

Orwell's disgust with modes of totalitarian thought and language is timely, as we watch press events overseen by Vladimir Putin, in which pliant journalists take down the leader's words as if they represent the world as it should be. The startling videos, viewable on YouTube, depicting Cossacks horsewhipping the musicians from the Russian punk group Pussy Riot, make Orwell's characterization of totalitarian society prescient: "Such a society, no matter how long it persists, can never afford to become tolerant or intellectually stable. It can never permit either the truthful recording of facts, or the emotional sincerity, that literary creation demands."

Here we have language that is nearly 70 years old, but which addresses, with great ethical vigour, the totalitarian character of life under Putin. One hopes there are Russian or Ukrainian novelists up to the challenge of a response, spurred by the dual images of Putin, legs spread, browbeating reporters, and the reappearance on the national stage of Cossacks wielding whips.

But there is shame in the fact that the entire Olympic theatre was acted out without a single substantial protest by athletes and their minders. In the mid-'40s, Orwell proposed that intellectuals who remained obediently silent alongside totalitarian violence "killed" books. Books v. Cigarettes reads today as a remarkable warning against such self-silencing.

A new perspective of war in coming-of-age novel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A young girl who finds an antique wooden doll that had passed from hand to hand and survived some of the worst wars of the last century is the subject of a debut novel titled Soldier Doll.

Jennifer Gold

Jennifer Gold, a 34-year-old lawyer with the Ontario Medical Association, and now a published writer, told The CJN about the inspiration behind her young adult novel, published by Second Story Press and released this month.

"I had the idea about a year and a half before I started writing. I was in Prague with my husband, and I was at the Jewish Museum. There was an art exhibit by children from the Terezin concentration camp," Gold said.

"We were looking at the art, and I sort of had this idea that maybe one of these children was living in a concentration camp and someone offered her this toy, this doll, and it would provide her with some comfort. The idea kind of grew from there. That was where I first had the idea, and that was the first chapter I wrote."

Soldier Doll is a story with two narratives – one told through the perspective of a 15-year-old girl named Elizabeth who just moved from Vancouver to Toronto, and another narrative set in the past in different wartime settings.

While rummaging through a garage sale, Elizabeth finds an antique, wooden, hand-painted doll in a soldier's uniform. She decides to buy it for her father, a military contractor who is preparing to ship out for Afghanistan.

"She realizes, through an encounter with a boy at a local used book store, that it might actually be the soldier doll that is the subject of a famous World War I poem," Gold said.

"The poem is fictional, but I envisioned it as sort of an In Flanders Fields type of poem, a poem that everyone would have studied in school. So the idea was that this was the actual soldier doll that inspired the famous poem of the same name. So, that had Elizabeth and this boy, Evan, trying to locate the various owners and the history and trying to place the soldier doll."

The book, told through flashbacks, takes the reader back to World War I, when the doll is first given to a British solider by his girlfriend. Following the British soldier's death, it's found by a Jewish German soldier in Ypres, who, years later, gives it to a young child in Terezin. The soldier doll later finds its way to Vietnam, then to Afghanistan following the Sept. 11 World Trade Center attacks, before being discovered by Elizabeth in 2007.

Gold said the book is completely fictional, but as a product of the Jewish day school system, she was more informed and able to write about concentration camps and about Kristallnacht, a pre-Holocaust event that is also mentioned in her book.

"That was drawing on the education I had growing up. I don't have any Holocaust survivors that I know of in my family, but it was a big part of my education. I was able to draw on that when I was writing."

In addition to wanting to tell a coming-of-age story, Gold said she also wanted her book to include lessons about history, and the idea that war is not as "black and white" as one might think.

"I think a lot of teenagers today would have the message that war is bad, and 'no blood for oil,' etc., etc., but what I wanted to show was it's not black and white... I wanted to get across that soldiers who go to war are often teenagers themselves, and they have their own reasons for going that may be different from the government's reason for going to war."

Soldier Doll is available on Amazon.ca and at Indigo bookstores.

Bethlehem is a tightly-wound and balanced thriller

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

The Israeli award-winning film Bethlehem has much in common with the Palestinian Oscar- nominated film Omar.

Both tell the story of a Palestinian informant working for Israel's secret service. However, while Omar's story was framed through the lens of its charismatic Arab protagonist, Bethlehem balances its time and perspective between both sides of the conflict.

Omar, nominated in the best foreign film category at this year's Academy Awards (and now playing in select Canadian cities), is more riveting as a thriller than its Israel-made counterpart.

However, Bethlehem – opening on March 28 – is a more nuanced look at the rifts and relationships between Israelis and Palestinians.

In Bethlehem, which won six Ophir Awards (Israel's Oscars), the Palestinian informant is a gangly but gutsy teen, Sanfur (Shadi Mar'i, who looks like the Middle Eastern equivalent of Michael Cera). His brother, Ibrahim (Hisham Suliman), is a wanted terrorist that Israeli intelligence agent Razi (Tsahi Halevi) has been trying to capture for a year.

When Ibrahim takes responsibility for a suicide bombing in Jerusalem, Razi tries to get Sanfur to give up his brother's whereabouts. Razi and Sanfur have a close relationship, although Sanfur is not comfortable betraying his brother.

In the midst of this confusion, Sanfur feels invincible. In Bethlehem's opening scene, he straps on a bulletproof vest and asks one of his friends to shoot him. Always in Ibrahim's shadow, Sanfur wants to prove that he has power. When he tries out the vest in a later scene and shoots himself in the stomach, he ends up with a bloody wound, a potent metaphor for the collateral damage that inevitably arises despite the hope of security.

Tsahi Halevi, left, as Israeli secret service agent Razi, and Shadi Mar'i as Sanfur in the award-winning drama Bethlehem.

The plot thickens when the secret service gets word that Sanfur may be transferring money to his brother, who has links to both Hamas and the al-Aqsa Brigade. Razi's boss, Levy (Yossi Eini), wants his agent to break ties with Sanfur if the teen does not provide a path to capture Ibrahim. (Levy refers to Sanfur as Esau, an obvious allegory).

Bethlehem is in Hebrew and Arabic, with English subtitles. It is the film debut of Israeli director Yuval Adler, an Israeli Jew who worked in military intelligence. Adler co-wrote the script with Ali Wakad, a Palestinian journalist. Their knowledge of Israeli politics adds authenticity to the drama. Their collaboration is likely why Bethlehem is a more balanced, intricate view of Israeli-Palestinian relations than Omar.

Unlike Omar, which portrayed neither side in a positive light, yet invested the audience in the plight of a Palestinian terrorist, Bethlehem shows the humanity and menace on both sides. As balanced as the drama is, though, Bethlehem is more sympathetic to the Israelis.

Most of the actors are newcomers, including Halevi and Mar'i. (Halevi is a former dancer and singer, although you would never guess it from his deeply arresting performance.) Both give tremendous turns as men trying to figure out their next move in a geopolitical realm where it is hard to feel protective or heroic. Mar'i and Halevi depict both the humanity and difficulty of everyday life on their anguished faces, and their scenes together are very touching.

If the film falters in any way, it is in illuminating the bond between the unstable Sanfur, who keeps moving between his allegiance to the Israelis and his Palestinian brethren, and Razi, also torn between his friendship for the teen and his patriotic duties. A few more scenes to explain the roots of their alliance would have made the climactic scene, when the two men confront each other, more suspenseful and significant.

Adler uses the camera less as a way to angle certain Israeli or Palestinian characters as heroes or villains but shoots much of the film head on, making it an objective observer that does not side with anyone. (Yaron Scharf, who also photographed the Oscar-nominated Footnote, is the cinematographer.)

Bethlehem portrays the Palestinians with depth, but also bitter honesty. After the Israelis bring down a terrorist, we see groups of Palestinians mourning and crying, as cameramen shoot their woe and misery. As soon as a terrorist group comes into the building to speak more menacingly about retribution for the dead man's death, they order the videographers to turn the cameras off.

The film also explores the rifts between Palestinians in terms of class, racial descent and political division: There is even a schism, as in reality, with the goals of different terrorist groups. Few films from the region have explored these tensions as acutely. Some of the musical choices are a bit overwrought, with dark, trembling music playing over some of the Palestinian violence.

Bleak but boldly acted, Bethlehem is one of the best explorations of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in modern cinema. Although not quite as taut a thriller as Omar, it is a more balanced examination of the ties that bind and break between the two populations.

RESISTANCE: Sisters in Resistance, an exhibit of oil paintings by Toronto artist Harry Tiefenbach runs until March 24 at The Gallery at the J, in the Miles Nadal JCC. The paintings celebrate women resistance fighters of World War II. Tiefenbach was born in Poland in 1946 to Holocaust survivors.

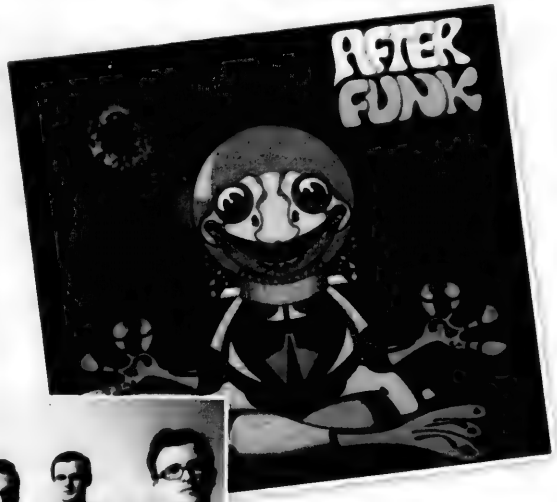
AFTER FUNK enjoys quick ascent in T.O. music scene



After Funk have gone from a foursome to an eight-piece band. Their music is easy to dance to and their unique sound is bound to catch on beyond Canada's borders.

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Whether it's headlining a show or opening a gig for one of their musical inspirations, Ontario-based funk and soul outfit After Funk is one of the hottest bands of the moment.

Their groovy, soulful sound, mixed with jazz and rock influences, have kept sell-out crowds dancing in Toronto clubs such as the Phoenix and the El Mocambo through the winter.

After Funk's shows are filled with retro and modern sounds. Among the group's eight members are a couple of young Jews with grooves: drummer Jaime Rosenberg and Phil Tessis, one of the band's two guitarists.

Rosenberg, 22, is one of the band's four founding members. With his Western University roommate Justin Bontje, a bass player, the duo set up a laid-back space in their dorm to play music. At school, the friends met keyboard player and vocalist Yanick Allwood and guitarist Bradley McBurney. The four quickly bonded over a love of funk and soul.

"We decided to sign up for a couple Battle of the Bands [contests], and we ended up winning them both," Rosenberg tells The CJN.

The foursome decided to make their sound even bigger. By the end of 2012, After Funk had doubled in size and increased its volume. Four more members, including Tessis, now 25, joined.

Rosenberg got interested in funk music in high school and was a big fan of the bands Soulive and Lettuce. Since After Funk launched, the Toronto musician has become friends with members of both groups.

Alan Evans, Soulive's drummer, mixed and mastered After Funk's self-titled album, which debuted in January. Meanwhile, the group opened for Lettuce at a February gig in Toronto.

"[With Lettuce], we played the Phoenix, which is a big place. That was the biggest crowd we've ever played for," Rosenberg says.

But jamming with some of his musical heroes couldn't match the electricity Rosenberg says he felt at a gig in the summer of 2013. On that July night, After Funk was booked to headline an after-party performance in Toronto to follow a Phish concert.

However, Phish cancelled its show in the wake of a big storm. As a result, some miserable fans flocked to After Funk's concert at the Great Hall instead, giving the rising collective the chance to save a dour night.

"Everybody was kind of bummed out and upset about Phish being cancelled and was in a bad mood," Rosenberg says. "Everybody who was [at the after-party] had a great time and wasn't thinking about Phish anymore. It kind of made them forget."

After Funk also played shows in 2013 alongside high-profile groups such as jazz-funk fusion band Snarky Puppy, which won a Grammy for best R&B performance earlier this year. The group also opened for hot New Orleans collective Dumpstaphunk and the Juno-nominated groups Walk Off the Earth and Five Alarm Funk.

"If we just keep opening for bands that I like to listen to, I'm happy," Tessis says, laughing. "It's inspiring to get to play shows with them. They're all really down-to-earth people."

Tessis joined After Funk in July 2012. At the guitarist's first gig, Allwood's keyboard malfunctioned and was out for the entire show. This could have been a challenge for Tessis, since he had only learned the songs the day before.

"I was responsible for covering all of the chords and stuff… [But] it was a fun first-gig experience," he says.

Although Tessis is a newer addition to the group, he wrote the music for the two instrumental songs on the band's groovy, seven-track EP. Allwood does the majority of After Funk's songwriting.

All eight members of the band have a music education, either from Western University, the University of Toronto or Humber College. Rosenberg currently studies music at Humber, in a program that Tessis graduated from in 2010.

After Funk's music has complex composition, but is easy to dance to. Infused with soul, synthesizer and a big, blasting horn section, their unique sound is bound to catch on beyond Canada's borders.

"We play funk, but we put so much else into it that it doesn't end up coming out as just funk anymore," Tessis says. "You get a bit of everything."

The group is gaining popularity locally, but they also have their sights set on down south. Rosenberg says the group is trying to find more chances to perform in the United States.

Other members of After Funk have roots in London, Ont., Hamilton and Toronto, and the group often performs in and around the Golden Horseshoe.

They will head east for their next show, at L'Escalier in Montreal on March 21, and they'll be playing the Merchant Tap House in Kingston the following night. The weekend marks the band's three-year anniversary of their first performance.

Rosenberg says he credits After Funk's quick ascent on the local music scene to the band's chemistry.

"Everyone's really close and gets along," he says. "That translates when we're on stage. The crowd picks up on that vibe. We're always striving to be as good as we can be and get the band sounding better."

Bat mitzvah girl raises $11,000 for Zareinu

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Tweens celebrating bar and bat mitzvahs today are emerging as major charitable forces, as some happily give away their monetary gifts.

When Alexa Edelstein, a Grade 7 student at Netivot HaTorah Day School, celebrated her bat mitzvah recently, she asked her guests to donate to the Zareinu Educational Centre, rather than giving gifts to her.

"She raised $11,000 and was beaming as she presented the cheque to the school," said Michelle Edelstein, Alexa's mother.

"Becoming a bat mitzvah was a milestone in my life. Not only did I want to do something meaningful, but I also wanted to be an inspiration to other kids to do the same," Alexa said.

Teaching kids about the responsibilities of Jewish adulthood, encouraging values of tikkun olam (repairing the world), giving back and raising funds for good causes can go hand in hand with this rite-of-passage, combining service, advocacy and study.

Alexa was exposed to Zareinu from an early age when she walked the runway at the centre's annual fashion show. "I would take Alexa every year to Zareinu's annual Moveathon, and today it is still one of her favourite things to do," Michelle Edelstein said.

Alexa's cousin, Rachel Benlolo, is a student at Zareinu, and a family friend has a little girl with Down syndrome who attends the school.

"I have seen the miracles they performed with Rachel," Alexa said.

Zareinu provides individualized therapies and treatments with an adapted education that includes Jewish teachings and traditions. Its mission is to improve the quality of life for children with disabilities and their families by providing the most up-to-date therapies and learning strategies to help them achieve their individual potential.

Last year, Alexa went with her class to Zareinu to learn about the different therapies and activities the teachers and therapists do with children to help them overcome their challenges.

"They asked us to put a sock on our hands and pick up Fruit Loops, then put them on a pipe cleaner to show us how it feels for many kids to do something that for us seems like a simple task. They also spun us around and when they stopped and we all felt dizzy, they told us that many kids feel this way without being spun around. They showed us words on a piece of paper with the letters mixed up so that we can see how a child with dyslexia feels."

Alexa said it was a great way to help the students appreciate how Zareinu works. "Visiting the school gave me a better understanding of… the types of challenges that many kids have. It made me sad to see so many kids with physical and developmental challenges, but, at the same time, happy that such a school exists and helps so many children and families," she said.

Rachel Benlolo's mother, Marlene Kenley, told The CJN, "As cousins, we are very blessed to have the family that we have. It's touching to witness the next generation of children getting involved and taking after their parents, such as Alexa supporting Rachel, wanting to be a part of her life, and understanding that Zareinu is such an important school. There are many children out there who need people like Alexa, and Rachel is one of them."

Not every child will become a philanthropist, but involving children in your family's charitable activities is one way to give them a sense of charity as part of a legacy of giving.

"We are all so worried about whether the next generation will care as much, or do as much. Here's a bat mitzvah girl making a big difference and setting an amazing example," said Shimon Vinger, director of development at Zareinu.

Alexa's message to other kids: "There's no better gift than the gift of giving."

Food sensitivities at seder

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

Passover is around the corner, and although I love hosting the seder, this year brings some extra challenges.

Besides kashrut, I must concern myself with my diabetic bubbie, a vegetarian sister, a dear friend whose son has a peanut allergy, and another friend who only eats gluten-free.

I used to be able to buy some prepared foods to help with the meal, but I can't take that chance this year. I don't know where to begin. I'm feeling a little overwhelmed. Any suggestions would be appreciated.

Seder Food Limitations

Dear Seder Food Limitations

It's a good thing you're starting early, because you'll need to do some extreme planning.

I suggest the first thing to do is to talk with your guests and find out if they have any suggestions. They're used to cooking for themselves and may have some helpful hints or easy recipes to get you through this. Once you have compiled a list, go through it and see which of the recipes will fulfil as many of the limitations you are challenged with. The one rule you must not veer from is nothing on the table, or even in your home if possible, should contain nuts. The peanut allergy is too serious to take a chance.

Use a cookbook that has nutritional information, so you can make sure you are in line with carbs and fats for bubbie. The Internet is also an amazing resource. Let me get you started.

From Norene Gilletz, www.ou.org/jewish_action/03/2013/anon-gebrokts-gluten-free-passover/ and from Kids with Food Allergies, www.kidswithfoodallergies.org/KFA-Celebrates-Passover.pdf

If kitniyot isn't a problem, then quinoa is a great alternative. Nut-free charoset recipes are in abundance on the Internet, as are gluten-free kugels and matzah ball recipes. Remember that meat eaters also enjoy vegetarian sides.

Now that you've done some research, create a menu and make your shopping list. If you take your time in the planning stages, you'll sail through this.

Before the meal is served, tell people which dishes are vegetarian, gluten-free low carb, etc., and you can announce that everything is nut-free. That way everyone's dietary limitations don't have to take control of the seder-table conversation.

You've been the ultimate concerned hostess. Pat yourself on the back for a job well done. Now your guests can truly sit back and enjoy the true meaning of celebrating Passover together with family and friends.

Dear Ella,

Mark and I have been dating for more than six months. We met on JDate and clicked from the first coffee date we shared.

Yesterday, I picked up his phone (which is identical to mine) and noticed emails that popped in from JDate. I am shocked and upset that he has not removed his profile, as I certainly have. I'm not sure what to do with this information. I don't want to seem like the jealous type, but I don't think this is right. Do you?

JDate Jilted

Dear JDate Jilted

It's too early to freak out. You haven't had a conversation yet. Be honest and in a calm and unemotional tone, tell Mark you picked up his phone by mistake and noticed emails from JDate, then let him take over the conversation.

Does he begin to hem and haw? Is he squirming and sweating like he was just caught? Or does he laugh it off with a plausible explanation like maybe he was just going to let his membership lapse on its own.

If you want a serious relationship, then no subject should be off the table, regardless of how uncomfortable it may be.

A good relationship is open and honest, and at six months you should know your boyfriend well enough to understand if this move was intentional, an oversight, or an all-out lie about what the two of you share.

Stop stewing and start talking. The harder the conversations are, the closer the two of you will become. It's the growing together and learning about each other that makes falling in love so special.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN, email: ellacjn@gmail.com. Ella is not a professional counsellor. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Jews, Arabs join forces to promote Israeli olive oil

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

People shopping for high-quality olive oil may one day skip the Italian and Spanish varieties and reach for the Israeli brands.

The creation of an international market for its product is a distant goal of the Israeli Olive Board, according to its emissary, Adi Naali, who recently spoke to a gathering of some 50 people at an olive oil tasting event at the Toronto home of Robert and Galya Sarner.

Naali, the manager of the Israeli Olive Board, and his colleague, Moghira Younis, an adviser on olives, figs, grapes and pomegranates at the Ministry of Agriculture, spent an intensive week in the GTA teaching people from a wide range of cultural backgrounds about Israel's burgeoning olive oil industry.

Naali and Younis gave 11 presentations – eight on college and university campuses and three geared to the Jewish community.

The olive oil tasting at the Sarner home was co-hosted by Galya Sarner, director of the Israeli-Canadian Project at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre, and Donna Holbook, national executive director of the Canadian branch of the International Christian Embassy of Jerusalem (ICEJ). It was sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs of UJA Federation.

Participants were treated to a sumptuous spread of hummus, cheese platters, and bowls of olive oil with French bread and crackers for dipping.

Later, they sipped shot glasses filled with some of Israel's finest olive oils, while Naali instructed them on how to distinguish high-quality extra virgin olive oil, which is cold pressed, from the cheaper, chemically processed oils. "A high quality oil should smell fruity," he said. "The more bitter and spicier taste, the better the olive oil."

Naali advised people to be cautious when buying olive oil, because a lot of extra virgin olive oil sold is adulterated with cheaper chemically processed oils.

He also spoke about the necessity of boosting olive oil consumption in Israel. About two litres per capita are consumed annually, which, he said, is low in comparison to Mediterranean countries like Greece and Spain, where the consumption rate is 26 and 15 litres per capita respectively.

Younis discussed some of the modern methods of olive cultivation, noting that each machine now used to harvest the olive trees replaces 260 workers.

He said one of the most innovative aspects of growing olives is the successful irrigation of the Negev. The desert is now blooming with olive groves that are irrigated with salt water.

Younis also told the group about his contribution to helping Arab Israeli women become economically independent. He is advising Sindyanna, an Arab women's co-operative based in the Galilee that is supported by both Arab and Jewish Israelis, on the cultivation of the Oasis Solidarity Organic Olive Grove in Wadi Arra, the village where he grew up.

The olive oil presentations and workshops were timed to coincide with Israeli Apartheid Week (March 3 to 11 this year), said Shirin Ezekiel, associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto. She explained that the relationship between Younis, an Arab Israeli, and Naali, who is Jewish, exemplifies the collegiality that exists between these two groups. "Part of the idea behind the presentations was to highlight the collaboration between Jews and Arabs within Israel."

Younis and Naali spoke at York University, University of Toronto, Ryerson University, and Seneca, Centennial and Humber colleges. The majority of the participants there were not Jewish, Ezekiel said.

Ezekiel said the students were particularly interested in the cultivation of the olives. "They were very excited about the olive trees growing in the desert. They thought it could be a model for other countries."

Chai Lifeline
Fighting Illness With Love

Since its establishment eight years ago, Chai Lifeline Canada has touched the lives of hundreds of families with support and programs that help alleviate the fear and isolation of pediatric illness and provide compassion and fortitude that allows families to face each day with renewed hope.

Throughout the year, Canadian families benefit from two-dozen programs and services that include ChaiLine telephone support groups, tutoring, Big Brother/Big Sister programs, family days, retreats and respite, case management, education and advocacy.

Last summer, 400 seriously ill children experienced a summer filled with laughter, love, and sunshine at Camp Simcha or Camp Simcha Special, Chai Lifeline's pioneering overnight camps designed to meet the medical and social needs of seriously ill children. They returned home filled with happy memories, determined to fight the pain of illness for another year.

Every Chai Lifeline Canada program is offered at no charge to families. We rely on you, our friends and supporters, to ensure that our programs and services continue to reach every Canadian family who needs us.

Desperate times, desperate measures

Opinion

Israel's Foreign Ministry workers association announced a general strike on Sunday as part of an ongoing labour dispute with the Israeli government, cutting off all consular services and regular diplomatic and public diplomacy work around the world. In this exclusive, personal article, DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, explains why.

DJ Schneeweiss
Special to The CJN

Israel's foreign service is in crisis.

Over a period of many years, our government has been engaged in a mostly unwitting hollowing out of one of the country's greatest resources – its ability to act on the international stage. As a result, and in an effort to staunch wounds that many of us fear may prove fatal to Israel's international standing and freedom of action, Israel's Foreign Ministry workers association initiated a strike on Sunday across our entire network of embassies and consulates, as well as at ministry headquarters in Jerusalem.

Here in Toronto, our consulate doors are shut. We have postponed or cancelled a series of events and initiatives with local partner organizations, as well as various public speeches and appearances and all our communications output.

Initiatives bring Jews, First Nations closer together

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

More than 100 years ago, Winnipeg businessman Harry Henteleff used to make it a practice to get out of town and do some hunting and fishing in the dense forests and pristine lakes that were plentiful on the Manitoba-Ontario border.

Henteleff was usually accompanied by guides from local First Nations communities, and the friendships he struck up stayed with him for life.

More recently, Henteleff's grandson, Michael Dan, has been making his way into a nearby area in Northwestern Ontario, not far from the Manitoba border, which was ceded by Anishinabe-speaking peoples to the Crown in what is known as Treaty 3.

Like his grandfather, Dan respects Aboriginal culture, but it's not hunting and fishing that brings him there.

Dan, president and CEO of Gemini Power Corporation, is promoting a hydro-electric project that he believes will benefit his company, as well as pay handsome dividends for local First Nations bands for generations to come.

"My family has a connection to Treaty 3 [lands] that goes back 100 years," said Dan. "Now his grandson has come back with several million dollars and is [developing] a hydro station in the area."

Dan is far from the first contemporary Jew to take an interest in Aboriginal well-being. Late last year, the Union of Reform Judaism (URJ), meeting in San Diego adopted a "Resolution on First Nations" advanced by a committee of the Canadian Council of Reform Jews/URJ. The resolution recounts the many social, economic, health and education challenges facing First Nations communities. It calls on Reform Jews to "continue to develop and strengthen relationships with the First Nations community." It also calls on the federal government to urge provincial authorities to teach First Nations history and to work with First Nations to address the challenges facing Aboriginal Canadians.

Nausea Drug Kosher

MONTREAL — The anti-nausea prescription drug for pregnant woman, Diclectin, has been certified kosher by the Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada. The Blainville, Que., pharmaceutical company Duchesnay Inc., announced March 11 that the drug now bears the COR hechsher for both regular and Passover use. Kashruth Council spokesperson Richard Rabkin said this is "the only kosher certified drug of its kind in Canada." This is the third of the company's products to be so recognized, said Carole Boyer, Duchesnay's vice-president, corporate affairs and communications. The others are the prenatal multivitamins PregVit and PregVit folic 5. She said they are also free of gluten, lactose and tartrazine, synthetic food colouring.

Nazi Party Apology

MINNEAPOLIS — A Minneapolis man who organized a World War II party with actors dressed in SS uniforms at a restaurant draped in Nazi flags issued a public apology March 19 on behalf of a World War II re-enactment group. Photos of the Jan. 20 event at a German restaurant in Minneapolis went viral last week, causing a backlash against the restaurant, Gasthof zur Gemutlichkeit, and its owner. Scott Steben said his group is "a historical re-enactment and professional actor society" that is "dedicated to promoting understanding of World War II. In no way are we or any of our members affiliated with groups that promote the subjugation of anyone." The party has been held annually at the restaurant for six years. The staff member who took the pictures was fired.

No Betrayal: Madoff

NEW YORK — Ponzi schemer Bernie Madoff said in a prison interview that he doesn't feel he "betrayed the Jews." Madoff, 70, is serving a 150-year sentence at a medium-security jail in Butner, N.C., for a scheme believed to be the largest of its kind in U.S. history, one that affected a disproportionate number of Jewish individuals and groups. "Religion had nothing to do with it," Madoff told Politico in an interview published March 20. "I don't feel that I betrayed the Jews. I betrayed people. I betrayed people that put trust in me-certainly the Jewish community. I've made more money for Jewish people and charities than I've lost." Madoff said he's tried to recover money for his victims, but his efforts have largely gone unacknowledged.

Appeal Court Rejects Suit Against Blogger

MONTREAL — The Quebec Court of Appeal has upheld a Superior Court ruling dismissing a defamation suit brought by three chassidic community leaders against a Montreal blogger.

Pierre Lacerte

In December, Superior Court judge Claude Dallaire rejected Michael Rosenberg, his son Martin Rosenberg and Alex Werzberger's $375,000 claim against Pierre Lacerte. On his blog Accommodements Outremont, Lacerte has for the past seven years chronicled chassidic community members' alleged infractions of municipal bylaws in the Montreal borough of Outremont.

The three plaintiffs first took Lacerte to court in 2008.

They claimed Lacerte singled them out for harassment and breach of privacy, repeatedly photographing them as they came and went from the synagogue across the street from his home. They said their reputations had been tarnished by Lacerte's continuous ridicule of them.

Dallaire found that the blog's content did not breach any laws and no evidence that Lacerte is motivated by anti-Semitism, as the trio alleged. Lacerte often uses biting satire and parody to make his point.

The Rosenbergs and Werzberger, represented by lawyer Julius Grey, had not as of last week decided whether to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court.

Family takes part in Canadian kidney donor exchange program

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

June 2, 2011, was a day the Carr family will never forget.

"Not because it was our dad's birthday, but because of the early morning call that our mother had been rushed to the hospital suddenly – going into cardiac arrest four times before learning that survival through the night was unlikely," said Leah.

The next few days were a blur, but, despite the odds, Leah's mother Suzan, who had not been sick prior to the scare, fought tirelessly to survive. Her body recovered, except for her kidneys.

Until recently, Suzan was on peritoneal dialysis for 10 hours a day.

On March 19, her fate changed drastically when she received a new kidney. Leah's life changed as well, as she became a donor.

To facilitate the kidney transplant, Leah and her mother participated in Canada's groundbreaking Living Donor Paired Exchange (LDPE). The LDPE, a partnership between Canadian Blood Services and transplant programs across the country, facilitates living kidney donation between patients with a willing but incompatible donor and someone in the same situation.

For a person requiring a kidney, receiving the organ from a living donor is optimal because it provides the best long-term outcomes for patients.

In Suzan's case, Leah donated a kidney to a stranger in Hamilton and her mother received a kidney from a stranger in Toronto.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

U.S.-Russian tensions could affect Iran file

According to Reports

by PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's news was understandably dominated by two major international stories unrelated to Israel and the Middle East: Russia's military takeover and annexation of Crimea, and the baffling disappearance of Malaysian Airlines Flight 370.

Although on the surface they're both unrelated to Israel and the Middle East, each has implications for the region.

Aviation security is always a key concern for all nations, but especially for the highly unstable Middle East. The perplexing questions raised in the Malaysian case, even though far away in Asia, make this a compelling story worldwide – one that brings attention, once again, to the unique features of Israeli airline security procedures. (A lengthy, but not uncontroversial, AP story carried in the March 15 Toronto Star headlined "Does Israel go too far in its airport security?" is just one example of this focus.)

On a different order of geopolitics, Russia's aggressive assertion of power in its immediate neighbourhood – including its continuing threat to the rest of Ukraine – is yet another reminder that Russian President Vladimir Putin appears unaffected by the prospect of U.S.-led sanctions against Russia. Putin is determined to flex his muscles in the face of what many analysts decry as weakening American resolve in other global trouble spots. Others cut U.S. President Barack Obama more slack, noting that his reset abroad is an understandable response to enormously costly but ultimately ineffective military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the resultant massive U.S. debt, and pressure to focus on domestic ills.

Yet much of the world still looks to American leadership abroad, wisely exercised, but firm. Perhaps nowhere is this required more than with respect to Iran's nuclear program and its military projection into the wider Middle East, especially its support of Bashar Assad's butchery in Syria, aided by its Lebanon-based proxy force Hezbollah and Shia fighters from Iraq. (To fill out this picture, we should also add Iran's financial and military support of Islamic Jihad and Hamas in Gaza, including its recently intercepted shipment of advanced missiles reportedly intended for smuggling into Gaza – a story mostly ignored internationally and only tepidly condemned, rather late in the day, by the American administration.)

Backed by Russia, Iran can only feel emboldened by Putin's belligerency and disdain for the United States.

Not to be forgotten, of course, is Russia's own participation in the P5+1 negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program. With friction growing between Russia and the United States over Ukraine, and elsewhere, how much more difficult will these already problematic negotiations become? And, despite American denials, how much weaker will the already partially relaxed trade and financial sanctions against Tehran become?

As the latest round of nuclear talks began last week (the same week Russia annexed Crimea), Emily Landau of Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies wrote a piece in Ha'aretz, "Is the U.S. determined enough to confront Iran?"

Far from Tehran's being constrained, as is commonly assumed, by the interim agreement reached last fall with the P5+1, Landau argues that "in some important respects, Iran's nuclear program is… progressing dangerously."

"The most important issue that constitutes, rather than a retreat, a 'roll-forward' of the program regards research and development on ever more advanced generations of Iranian centrifuges," Landau notes.

In the meantime, contrary to a statement from the U.S. State Department during the Crimean crisis that Russia was expected to "remain an active partner" in the Iran nuclear talks, AP reported on March 19 that "U.S.-Russian tensions over Ukraine spilled over into nuclear talks with Iran… with Moscow's chief envoy at the negotiations warning that his country may take 'retaliatory measures' that could hurt attempts to persuade Tehran to cut back on programs that could make atomic arms."

Almost no serious analyst actually expected Russia to play a positive role, but this is further evidence of how Russia may actively undermine efforts to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons.

An already messy situation fraught with serious doubt about where Iran's nuclear program is headed just got messier – and more dangerous.

History and Back Story

Leon Wieseltheir, literary editor of the New Republic magazine, put it best when he described the recent book My Promised Land and its author, Ha'aretz columnist Ari Shavit, as "splendidly unobliging." There's no doubt about it: for Shavit, the history of Israel is not complete without acknowledging, as he defines it, both the good and the bad. Put it all together and none of it makes sense. But, Shavit asks, who says it has to?

My Promised Land is all about contradictions, so it only makes sense that any discussion of it reflect that fact.

As he told The CJN a few weeks ago, Shavit argues the story of the Jewish state is defined by two overriding themes: "occupation" and "intimidation" (by which he means the existential threat posed to Israel by its Arab and Muslim neighbours). My Promised Land is his meditation on how that came to be and what it might take to escape from the dual burden of occupation and intimidation. Shavit concludes that reversing course on the former is the only path forward, though he acknowledges doing so won't guarantee alleviation of the latter. It won't be easy – it may be impossible – but for Shavit, it's worth a shot. My Promised Land is daring, at times very moving, and worth a read.

But for some readers, My Promised Land will be full of half-truths, inconsistencies and stylized history, and all of it should leave readers suspicious about Shavit's true intentions. Indeed, it is hard to believe he is an Israeli himself. In particular, the chapter entitled "Lydda, 1948" calls into question Shavit's judgment. At the very least, the author is guilty of not telling the whole story. The expulsion of Lydda's 40,000 Arabs during the War of Independence was but one part of Israel's battle for survival against the Arab world. To single out Lydda as the focal point is unfair and irresponsible.

There is another issue with My Promised Land: Shavit engages in historical navel-gazing about a country and a people he suggests has neither the time nor the inclination to look backward. Israelis, the author claims, are too caught up in the now – the constant fear of attack on the one hand, and a lust to live life to the fullest on the other – to indulge in history lessons. If that's the case, then what is the point of My Promised Land in the first place? What's so revolutionary about this book?

Is My Promised Land an honest portrayal of Israel or the work of a man moulding history to fit his agenda? One thing is for sure: it's a frustrating read, just as Shavit intended it to be.

"Back Story" is a feature of the new CJN – debuting April 10 in case you missed the news – that I'm particularly excited about. The basic conceit is this: every week, you'll read a story from Judaism's past and learn how it fits into the larger narrative of Jewish history. Some stories will be uplifting, others tragic, but all will contribute to your understanding about how we got here, and perhaps hint at where we're going next.

What happened to 'never again'?

During World War II, many alarms were sounded to the West that the Nazis were exterminating thousands of people in death camps. Activists called for the United States to bomb railway lines leading to concentration camps, but to no avail. The slaughter of innocents continued until the end of the war. Now the United Nations has learned that North Korea is duplicating, on its own citizens, the horrors performed by the Nazis.

There is a concern that a resolution condemning North Korea before the United Nations Security Council would be useless, since China would veto the resolution. Am I not correct that the General Assembly of the United Nations can override the Security Council in spite of a veto and then the matter could be referred to the International Criminal Court of Justice for prosecution of Kim Jong-un and his cronies?

What happened to the pledge "never again"?

Please don't call them custom tailors

I read the article about the Lichtenstein brothers who make suits ("Brothers make suits that are Made2Measure," The CJN, March 13). I commend these young adults for their entrepreneurship, but please don't call them custom tailors. The artistry of custom-made suits involves a lot more than taking some measurements and sending them off to a factory in China to be sewn.

My father was a custom tailor with a shop on Eglinton Avenue for many years. My dad took pride in transforming a piece of cloth into a perfectly fitting suit.

It was true artistry, from the cutting of the pattern down to the hand-sewn button holes and lining that my mother finished the suit with. If the fit wasn't to his satisfaction, he would rip the arm off or the whole back and redo it.

Former customers would tell him decades later that they still have the bar mitzvah or wedding suit he made them – and that it was the best suit they ever had.

Unfortunately, true custom tailoring is a dying trade, and the workmanship cannot be duplicated by factory workers. Please don't misrepresent what this business really is.

Thanks for a good read

For the first time ever today, I read The Canadian Jewish News (March 20), which arrived with my morning paper. For the most part, I thought the articles were balanced, but I think you should have included a story from someone supporting the proposed charter of values to allow the reader at least to see the arguments on the other side.

Best article, at least for me, was "Is criticism of Israel anti-Semitic?" It is my experience that some on the far left, knowing that overt anti-Semitism is unacceptable, are using exaggerated criticism of Israel as a proxy.

However, I found the article by NDP MP Charlie Angus to be self-serving ("Cultural approach important in end-of-life care"), as I would expect from a politician.

All in all, though, a very good read.

Shul attendance is no joke

I found the headline on the front page article (The CJN, March 13), "Skip synagogue with our DIY method" irresponsible and inappropriate. As synagogue attendance dwindles across North America and intermarriage rates soar, I expect the printed voice of the Canadian Jewish community to support Jewish observance.

To suggest that synagogue attendance is a "do it yourself" activity marginalizes organized religion and further jeopardizes the tenuous existence of many synagogues in our community.

As a regular synagogue attendee and long-standing shul board member, I am insulted by the tongue-in-cheek tone of the article. Certainly The CJN can find enough meaningful topics in the Jewish world to headline the weekly paper.

Naim Kattan, archetypal Diaspora Jew

Sharon Abron Drache

"Apart from and yet a part of" is a common phrase used to describe Diaspora Jewry, but it has never applied better to any Jewish Canadian than it does to Naim Kattan, prolific francophone writer of novels, essays and literary criticism. Of his numerous books (40 by his count), only five have been translated into English.

It was back in the mid-1980s, as a freshly-minted literary journalist that I began devouring Kattan's work, Adieu Babylon (1975) and Les fruits arrachés (1977), translated by Sheila Fischman in 1976 and 1979 respectively, as Farewell Babylon and Paris Interlude. Both are thinly disguised memoirs portraying their fictional protagonist Meir's colourful, hybrid childhood and his initiation into adulthood, accessed via his preferred world of ideas revealed in literature, and by his discovery of "woman," symbolically singular for Kattan because women represent cultural mediation and the source of community he longs to be a part of, but again and again chooses to be distanced from.

His numerous collections of essays repeat the theme pursued in his first collection, Le réel et le théâtral (1970), translated as Reality and Theatre in 1972 by Alan Brown after it won the Prix-France Canada in 1971. In them, Kattan explores cultural, religious and linguistic differences between occidental and oriental ways of perceiving reality.

He writes, "I am irresistably drawn to this magnetic universe with its seductive multiplicity, but just at the point of being absorbed and swallowed by it, I draw back: the actor doubles his function, I become a spectator."

In 1982, 11 of his short stories were translated by Judith Madley and Patricia Claxton, appearing as Neighbour and Other Stories in the prestigious New Canadian Library series of McClelland and Stewart. It was a collection "infused with dislocation – emotional spiritual and cultural," wrote William French, then premier books columnist at the Globe and Mail.

I responded to these four Kattan books in my own reviews for Jewish and secular newspapers, claiming Kattan as the most cosmopolitan of our contemporary Jewish Canadian writers, with the exception of A.M. Klein (1909-1972).

Kattan, whose name shares with Klein's the meaning "little," demonstrates a similar cosmopolitanism, particularly visible in Klein's last collection of poetry, The Rocking Chair, and his acclaimed novel, The Second Scroll.

Kattan's fifth and last book available in English is A.M. Klein, poet and prophet (2001), translated by Edward Baxter. The slim volume written for secondary school students is, by its very classification, limiting for Kattan, yet he manages to drive home how much he admires Klein for his exploration of literary traditions in the Bible and the Talmud.

Born into an intellectual Jewish family in Baghdad in 1928, Kattan spent his formative years in two worlds, Jewish and Arab. He and his brother, Nessim, were the only Jews in a group of feisty young teenagers who met every evening in a café to talk about creating a national Iraqi literature. In Farewell Babylon, reissued in 2006 by Raincoast in Canada and subsequently by David Godine in the United States, Kattan writes, "Living on the fringe of the Muslim world, we could sense its strangeness, which was often transmuted into exoticism. For us, it was also a world of hostility and compromise. We were close to the Muslims and consequently it was imperative that we avoid their blows, appeal to their goodwill. As long as they left us alone."

Sadly, they did not. In 1941, after the British forces defeated the German-backed Iraqi insurgents, and before they could secure Baghdad, angry Bedouins began the Farhoud, the massacre of the city's Jews. Taking refuge on the roof of his house, 13-year-old Kattan recalls thinking, "I am going to die even before I have started to live," when miraculously, the carnage stopped just short of his family home.

The long process of obtaining visas began. Kattan occupied himself by writing and selling stories to literary magazines. In 1945, he won a scholarship to study at the Sorbonne, and because of the danger for Jews in his homeland, he bade farewell to Baghdad. It would be several years before he would be reunited with his family who had emigrated to Israel and were living in ma'abarot – provisional camps hastily erected throughout the country that housed some 257,000 refugees by the end of 1951.

Although Kattan's language of choice is French, his first language is Arabic. At his Baghdad school, the Alliance Israélite Universelle, he learned French, English and Hebrew. Kattan's "apart from and yet a part of" destiny was rewakened on his first annual class trip to the ancient ruins of Babylon. His English teacher's word still reverberate: "Only the Jews can feel the upheaval of a living past under these piles of stone. Nothing ties the Arabs to Babylon. When they conquered it, we were already there. We are the true natives, we came here as captives, the slaves of Nebuchadnezzar. But we triumphed over defeat. On this ground we wrote the Talmud. The descendants of captives, the sons of slaves were great scholars, great philosophers. Are we worthy of our ancestors?"

In the 1990s, Kattan decided to close the circle that he began when he left Iraq for France in 1945, immigrated to Canada in 1954 and settled in Montreal. Currently, he divides his time between Montreal and Paris, living six months at a time in each city. The "apart from and yet a part of" quality that began to shape his existence on that terrifying night on the roof of his family home in Baghdad during the Farhoud, and that was reinforced on his school's annual visits to Babylon, has become an entrenched and continuously sought-after pattern.

Passover baggage and Pesach magic

Sara R. Horowitz
in Toronto

I once had a dream about luggage. In my dream, I was packing for a trip and couldn't seem to sort out the appropriate clothing for the destination. I kept piling up clothing and other gear, attempting to stuff everything into different suitcases. But try as I might, I couldn't get myself packed. Finally, I realized the problem. My baggage was all wrong. My last dream thought was: I can't go where I want because of my baggage.

My first thought upon waking was "Hello, subconscious! Could a metaphor be any more transparent?" Appearing literally as luggage in the dream, baggage is used to signify not so much the physical stuff we take with us when we travel, but the internal stuff that comes with us wherever we go – traces from our past and things in our present that encumber us, weigh us down, burden us and keep us from moving forward.

I thought about that long-ago dream recently while transitioning myself from the easy excesses of Purim revelry to the daunting excesses of Passover planning. Pesach is a kind of reckoning, different from the solemn reckoning of the High Holidays halfway around the calendar, but sober in its own way. It brings to mind where you've come from and where you're headed.

Family seders offer a telling snapshot, hinting at what occurred during the past year. Sometimes the snapshot includes new faces – friends from university whose home is too distant for them to get there for the holiday, significant others, new spouses, babies and toddlers. Sometimes faces are missing: someone's moved to a different part of the world, someone's been widowed, someone's divorced, someone's feuding.

For many, seders are always tinged with nostalgia, with a longing for an unrecoverable past. My late Aunt Elaine, for example, held mega-seders for the extended family and a growing network of friends. Often there were 40 or 50 people chanting, singing and eating. Her seders were a happening thing, the place to be. Yet I remember her confiding in me that she always missed my grandfather's seders – missed, that is, the seders of her childhood in her father's home. That, for her, was the real Pesach. Her own seders were Proustian searches for time past.

Perhaps she also missed the magic of being a child on Pesach. For an adult, that magic is replaced by the labour of production – food production, stage production, cultural production – those very aspects that make the festival so magical for children. Yet we adults, too, need a taste of magic. Sometimes we find it in the voices of children gathered around the table. Sometimes we catch it in a wisp of a melody handed down from ancestral Pesach celebrations.

But sometimes the logistics of magic-production dampens the magic for those who create it for others. Pesach is a home-centred festival whose centrepiece is the seder, but whose behind-the-scenes orchestration extends backwards, exhaustingly, for days, even weeks. I remember some years coming to the seder bone-weary, grateful that all that needed to be on the table could somehow be found on it and realizing that with all my list-checking and preparations, I hadn't carved out a space for spiritual preparation. I'd thought about menus, but not meaning.

It's not that this ritual labour – or labour for rituals – is divorced from spirituality and meaning. On the contrary, all "this work," as both the wise and wicked children call it, is designed precisely to induce a turn to the spirit. But for me, at any rate, there needs to be also a contemplative space, a pause in the frenetic juggling of work, family, and festival demands, to drop the mundane and to focus on what is transcendent and sublime.

There's a delicious irony in all this – a weaving together of burden and privilege, of enslavement and redemption – in short, the mixed baggage of our biblical ancestors who fled the land of their oppression in triumph and in fear, carrying the flat bread that symbolized both poverty and freedom. Their challenge was not so different from ours: how to turn complicated baggage not into an encumbrance but into spiritual riches.

Oh, and my dream about my baggage? The next day, I bought myself a new suitcase.

There's more to world Jewry than Israel and America

Rabbi Dow Marmur
in Toronto

At a conference last month on the theme of "Winds of Change," held at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, a session was devoted to "Israel and World Jewry." Two of the three panelists and the moderator were olim from the United States, while the third, though born in Israel, had worked as a rabbi in America.

None of the speakers mentioned any Diaspora country other than the United States. The 1-1-/2 million-plus Jews in Europe and thriving Jewish communities in Latin America and Australia weren't even on their radar.

In an attempt to widen the scope of the discussion, I intervened to say that I'm a product of four Jewish diasporas, none of them American. My purpose was to alert the panel to the fact there are Jews who live neither in Israel nor the United States yet are very much part of world Jewry. Like a listener in Uruguay who made a similar point via the Internet, I was virtually ignored.

Canadians are familiar with American provincialism. At conferences on this continent, Canada is often listed between California and Colorado, because most organizers like to think that, at least as far as the Jewish community is concerned, Canada is little more than another American state.

After Prime Minister Stephen Harper's visit to Israel, with an entourage that included many Jews, Israelis had some intimations of Canadian Jewry, but they, too, tend to look at the non-American Diaspora, and particularly Europe, as inhospitable to Jewish life and only relevant as a potential source of aliyah. Most of what they know seems to come from reports of anti-Semitic incidents there.

By contrast, Jews in Canada, perhaps because they're also on the outside, have good reason to care about the warm winds of change in all of world Jewry.

Take, for example, Germany, the birthplace of virtually every modern religious stream in Judaism. Because of immigration from the former Soviet Union, there are now some 120,000 Jews in the country. In order to serve and develop non-Orthodox Judaism, the Abraham Geiger College was established about 15 years ago. Named after one of the founders of liberal Judaism in the 19th century, it trains rabbis and cantors for home and abroad.

It isn't the first liberal institution of its kind in Europe. In 1956, the Leo Baeck College came into being in London. It's named after the legendary liberal rabbi who led German Jewry during the Nazi period before he was sent to the Therezienstadt concentration camp.

Thanks to Leo Baeck College graduates, the Reform and liberal movements in Britain have become important and integral parts of Anglo Jewry. Some alumni are now also spiritual leaders abroad, including Germany. At one point, four of them served different congregations in Canada.

Recently, a sister institution to Geiger College came into being to train professionals for Conservative communities in Germany and elsewhere. And now the two colleges have been linked to the School of Jewish Theology at the University of Potsdam near Berlin. The school, established last November and funded by the German government, is arguably the first of its kind in the world and telling evidence of another very strong wind of change in world Jewry.

The German schools are reaching out to non-Jews. Their academic director, Admiel Kosman, a respected Israeli poet and scholar, recently told the weekly Der Spiegel that "we are training rabbis for the whole society, not just for the Jewish community." He stressed that just as Jews have much to learn from other faiths, so do Germans have much to learn from Judaism and that he's committed to "openness on a lot of levels."

Because the founder of the Hartman Institute, the late Rabbi David Hartman, had been the spiritual leader of a congregation in Montreal before making aliyah, the institute has strong links to Canada in addition to its base in the United States. But though it's concerned with Jews everywhere in their relation to Israel and is also engaged in contemporary theology across religious divides, it doesn't seem to have yet taken sufficient notice of what's happening outside Israel and North America.

Perhaps one day, all who care for winds of change in the Jewish world will pay due attention to the full gamut of contemporary Jewish life, for – to paraphrase the Canadian bank slogan – it's richer than you think.

Mikeys save lives in honour of one who lost his own

18 people revived by network of portable defibrillators

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Talmud teaches us that "Whoever saves a life, it is considered as if he saved an entire world."

In the case of the Mikey Network, that now comes to 18 entire worlds saved – families remaining intact, wives with their husbands, children with their parents – all thanks to the presence of a portable defibrillator about the size of a lunch box.

The Mikey Network's website counts 17 lives saved thanks to the presence of its public access defibrillators (PADs), but it doesn't take into account the latest beneficiary of the widely available medical devices.

The 18th person – a portentous number in Jewish tradition, as 18 also signifies "life" – is a middle-aged guy who was playing hockey at a rink in Aurora when he collapsed on the bench. Quick use of the defibrillator's paddles got his heart beating and raised the number of lives – and universes – saved by one.

L'chayim, as they say.

To date, there are some 1,500 Mikey defibrillators across the province (and a few elsewhere) in public venues as diverse as community centres, gyms, swimming pools, schools and shuls.

In the Jewish community alone there are more than 20 units, including a number at elementary and high schools, synagogues and even two at cemeteries.

More than 200 schools in the Greater Toronto Area already have Mikeys on hand, and on April 22, the Mikey Network will formally announce a $500,000 program that will provide 250 units to the Peel District School Board over the next three years.

For housing developer Hugh Heron, the prevalence of the Mikeys – he hopes the name becomes an accepted shorthand for the defibrillators – is a testament to a fine friend and valued colleague. To Irit Salem, it provides a blessed memory to her late husband, after whom the Mikey Network is named.

Twelve years ago, Mike Salem was playing golf at a course in Muskoka when he began to feel ill. He hit his first shot but by the time he was ready to hit his second, his heart had stopped. He was miles away from any medical attention and, as the Mikey Network says in its promotional literature, "Mike passed away doing what he loved best, playing golf."

The Mikey Network was created in his memory by Heathwood Homes and the Heron Group of Companies, where Salem was a partner.

Heron, chair of the Mikey Network, recalled Mike Salem as "larger than life. He was an amazing individual. He was a special person. He brought something to the table. He brought something into our lives as a partner and a friend."

For the Israeli-born Irit, the success of the network is particularly gratifying:

"It's a great honour to keep his name alive," she said. "It's amazing that because of him, so many people have been saved."

You can count Andrew Rosbrook as one of them. The Toronto police officer was running the GoodLife half marathon last May when he suffered a cardiac event just a few metres from the finish line. Quick use of a Mikey, donated to Toronto Emergency Medical Services, saved him.

The Mikey Network receives requests for the PADs on a regular basis. Morty Henkle, executive director of the organization, handles the requests and determines in conjunction with others to what extent the recipient should contribute to the costs of the units, as well as the CPR training that accompanies them.

"One organization that understood the benefit of Mikeys was GO Transit," Henkle said. "Now, we have 125 defibrillators on trains and in stations. They have saved lives."

In addition, 128 Mikey defibrillators have been allocated to families with children suffering heart problems. The presence of the defibrillators in the family home allows the youngsters to lead as normal a life as possible, without worrying whether help can arrive in time if the child suffers a cardiac incident.

The Mikey Network has developed relationships with the Hospital for Sick Kids in Toronto, the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario in Ottawa, and with McMaster Children's Hospital in Hamilton, which recommend youngsters who could benefit from the devices.

"Last Christmas, a two-year-old baby in Nobleton was saved by a defibrillator," Henkle said.

Heron, Salem and Henkle want to make the devices as prevalent as fire extinguishers, which are just about everywhere. Why not? Heron and Salem ask. Fire extinguishers save property, but Mikeys save lives.

And heart attacks can happen anywhere. Approximately 40,000 incidents of sudden cardiac arrest occur in Canada each year, 7,000 of them in Ontario.

About 17 to 20 per cent take place outside the home. Quick use of a defibrillator can increase the chance of survival by 50 per cent, the organization says.

What makes the Mikey particularly attractive to laypeople is its ease of use. The machine provides verbal instructions and once the paddles are placed on the chest of the person suffering a cardiac incident, the machine diagnoses the problems and determines whether a shock is required.

Each machine costs $2,500. The Mikey Network's corporate sponsors provides some of the funds, and the charity solicits donations from the public. Since its inception, the Mikey Network has raised more than $3 million, placed more than 1,500 life-saving Mikeys in public places across Canada, trained more than 12,000 people in CPR/AED (automated external defibrillator) and saved 18 lives, including three students in Toronto high schools.

School's Purim project reaches out to others

CJN Staff

Students and staff worked together as a school community at The Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan, Ont., on a weeklong mishloach manot chesed project to reach out to their neighbours in honour of Purim.

Together, the school community made more than 100 mishloach manot packages, which were then hand-delivered to the residents and program attendees at the Reena Community Residence on the Schwartz-Reisman Centre's Lebovic Campus.

Students spent their lunch hour playing games, singing Purim songs and creating holiday arts and crafts. Money raised for the project was donated to Mazon Canada.

Middle schoolers create outdoor mini libraries

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School are the first in the Greater Toronto Area to take part in the Little Free Library project, which promotes literacy with its "take a book, leave a book" policy.

An initiative that began in 2009, the goal of the Wisconsin-based non-profit is to build small outdoor community libraries – about the size of large birdhouses – to be placed in neighbourhoods and for community organizations.

As part of a Literacy Week project, held annually from Jan. 27 to Feb. 1, students at Danilack in grades 6 to 8 built 17 library boxes using wood, nails, hammers and glue.

The 17 boxes will be placed at each of the four Associated branches, as well as at two fire stations in Vaughan, at Chai Lifeline, Zareinu, DANI Toronto, B'nai Brith centres, daycares, food banks and nursing homes.

This year, the school's Literacy Week activity was themed "For the Love of Reading," and Nadine Sheinberg, Danilack's teacher librarian, felt that building community libraries fit the theme perfectly.

"Normally, every year for Literacy Week, we do something – a big idea... Our principal, Brenda Dzaldov, actually saw an article about [Little Free Library], which she showed me in September," Sheinberg said.

"When it came time to do Literacy Week, it was a natural thing. We thought, we'll build these and then we started to think about how we would connect with the community. We generally do tzedakah projects with the school and we think about reaching out. This was sort of the perfect combination... to give back to the community and to continue to instil that love of reading."

The process started in November when Sheinberg and some teachers began reaching out to different organizations to establish which ones wanted to receive a library, before registering as members of the Little Free Library organization.

"The idea was that each class would build their own little free library. Part of our activity for Literacy Week was that we had the kids come in on a rotating basis and they built their little free libraries, and we also had book drives running. People have been donating books, which we're going to be putting in these libraries, so every library will be packed full and donated."

An educational organization called You Can Do It also came in to give the students instructions on how to build them.

The outdoor libraries are constructed to withstand the elements and are meant to be self-sustaining.

"They're made of wood, but it's waterproof wood. We had it sourced. And they've been painted with outdoor paint and they're sealed, and there is a vent so the books don't get mildew," Sheinberg said.

She said the students have completed building them, and they're ready to be delivered.

"This week we'll be contacting the organizations to see when would be best and then we're having kids sign up, kids who want to come with us, and we'll be organizing, in conjunction with each organization, a time to go and drop if off and have a mini-celebration," Sheinberg said.

Fundraiser held for Kidney Foundation

"This is how the paired exchange works. There are a chain of people who give and receive kidneys across Canada on the same day," Leah said.

After the surgery, Leah's full recovery will take six to eight weeks.

"I can't drive for two weeks or lift anything heavier than a laptop for eight weeks. Recovery will be a challenge, but nothing compared to the challenge my mom had being on dialysis 10 hours a day."

To celebrate this life-changing experience, Leah and her brother, Devon, along with their closest friends, created a fundraiser for the Kidney Foundation of Canada on March 13, World Kidney Day. It was held at the Uptown Loft in midtown Toronto.

"It is important to spread awareness of kidney disease because one in 10 people are affected and you don't hear about it frequently enough. A lot of cases wouldn't be as bad if they had been treated sooner," Devon said.

Leah and her brother initially hoped to raise $5,000 through their event. Their goal was exceeded within 24 hours. In total, the siblings raised more than $25,000 for the foundation.

"The public response has been overwhelming and amazing. First of all, our friends who formed the committee with us made this personal and about them as much as us. We are lucky to have so many amazing friends. The event sold out fast, and there were so many other people who wanted tickets. Well over 100 people donated, some that we haven't been in touch with for years. This has been the most positive experience," Leah said.

Suzan, who attended the event, said she was shocked that her children were able to find the time to organize the fundraiser. "I am amazed at the outpouring of donations from family and friends and everyone's generosity. My children have always excelled and lived their lives giving back. I couldn't possibly be prouder."

She said she hopes the event brought more awareness to the fact that so many people are waiting for kidneys, yet so few organs are available.

"Hopefully more people will sign their donor cards or just consider donating as they would be saving a life. Many live with only one kidney."

Darchei Noam sponsors lecture on the Jews of Libya

CJN Staff

In 1948, nearly one million Jews lived in the Arab countries of the Middle East and North Africa. Today, only a handful remain.

Facing pogroms, expulsions and persecution, Jews fled their Arab host nations for friendlier locations. One of them, Regina Malaka Bublil left Tripoli, Libya, in 1967 after nearly being murdered.

On Sunday April 6, Bublil, whose married name is Gina Waldman, will discuss the Jews of Libya at a public lecture at Congregation Darchei Noam, beginning at 7:30 p.m.

A resident of the United States for the last 35 years, Waldman is co-founder of JIMENA, Jews Indigenous to the Middle East and North Africa.

The San Francisco-based organization is dedicated to preserving Mizrahi (eastern) and Sephardi culture and history, as well as exposing the Mizrahi and Sephardi story of oppression and displacement.

Waldman's address is part of a series of lectures at Darchei Noam on "The Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands 1947-1967."

Reform rabbi reflects on legal battle

First to get state funding after Israeli court case

Frances Kraft
Special to The CJN

When Reform Rabbi Miri Gold was pursuing a lengthy legal battle to receive her salary from the Israeli government – like Orthodox rabbis in Israel – she would "conjure up faces" of North American supporters she had met, as if they were actually in court with her.

Rabbi Miri Gold

Moral support is "of crucial importance," she told The CJN March 19.

"When a small group comes from a congregation in North America to visit, and we see that we're with like-minded people, it gives us much more strength to keep going. We don't feel so isolated."

Israel, in turn provides "nourishment and identity" to Diaspora Jews, she believes.

Rabbi Gold was in Toronto to begin the first leg of a three-city Canadian tour sponsored by ARZA Canada, the Zionist arm of the Reform movement. She was scheduled to speak at four synagogues and to meet with high school students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto before heading to Montreal and then Ottawa after Shabbat.

The main reason for her trip here was to speak on behalf of ARZA Canada and raise money for Reform preschools in Israel. As well, she planned to fundraise for a new building for her congregation, Kehilat Birkat Shalom, on Kibbutz Gezer, a 300-member kibbutz between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. The congregation is currently housed in a "one-room schoolhouse." Funding for the new building is well underway, and there is a time-sensitive component because of a government grant being made available by the local regional council, she added. She also expected to talk about her legal battles.

The culmination of her case in May 2012, when Israel's Supreme Court decided to pay salaries to rabbis of non-Orthodox council and farming communities, was a "historic precedent" and "a major step forward toward achieving religious pluralism in Israel," according to Rabbi Gold's bio.

But it wasn't until December 2013 that the government transferred $86,000 to the Reform movement in Israel to pay the salaries of the rabbi and three of her colleagues. The sum represents only a partial retroactive payment, with more to follow this year "if we filled out more forms," Rabbi Gold said. She is sanguine about the fact that the funding is from Israel's Culture and Sport Ministry. "Judaism is cultural in many ways," she noted.

Ironically, when she made aliyah in 1977, the future rabbi thought it would be easier to be Jewish in Israel than her native Detroit. In some ways, that's been true, she said, but not in others.

For one thing, Rabbi Gold has become a high-profile figure not just for her court case, which she launched in 2005, but also because she was a rarity as the third woman to be ordained by Jerusalem's Hebrew Union College in 1999.

Prior to the court's decision, the Reform movement in Israel paid 70 per cent of Rabbi Gold's salary, and her congregation funded the remainder. "The money coming from the government will certainly ease the burden on everybody."

Hers was "clearly a test case," Rabbi Gold said, noting that the legal decision applies only to rabbis who live in a regional council or community with up to 5,000 people. "City rabbis are not yet getting money, but it's a start."

She said she doesn't regret that her case took so long to resolve. "Things have changed, slowly but surely… I think Israel's more ready for it now.

In recent years, Rabbi Gold explained, the Israeli public has become increasingly sympathetic to the cause, because more Israelis have been exposed to Reform Judaism, either overseas or at life-cycle events in Israel, which has about 40 Reform congregations. Things were different when she was originally approached by the Israel Religious Action Center, the public and legal advocacy arm of the Reform movement in Israel, to petition the Supreme Court.

Part of the delay in resolving her case was a reluctance on the part of the government to refer to non-Orthodox rabbis as rabbis rather than cultural leaders, she said. "Thankfully IRAC and the Reform movement insisted that they recognize that the money was going to rabbis."

A longtime kibbutznik with a low-key manner, Rabbi Gold, an alumna of the University of Michigan, entered rabbinical school somewhat late in the game at the encouragement of family and rabbinic friends. She had spent 10 years working in the kibbutz kitchen and a year working with small children. After a stint in Boston, where her husband served as a kibbutz/Reform movement shaliach in the 1980s, she gradually assumed a quasi-rabbinic role on the kibbutz.

At the time of her ordination, one article referred to Rabbi Gold as "Harav Cookie," a nod to her love for baking and the giant chocolate chip cookies she used to sell to a Jerusalem ice cream parlour, as well as to the name of the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine (Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook) in the early 20th century. Mostly, though, people call Rabbi Gold by her first name, which is how she prefers it.

The rabbi still bakes for fun and relaxation. Her husband, David Leichman – a Jewish educator – is an accomplished ice cream maker. The couple, now the parents of three grown children, met while they were working in the kitchen of the garin (settlement group) that they joined when they made aliyah.

"I really see the Jewish People as a family," said Rabbi Gold, who cited instances of mutually respectful relationships she has with some members of the Orthodox community.

"Not everyone has the same lifestyle, opinion, or political ideas. Hopefully, in a well-functioning family, people are loyal to one another, and they weather disagreements, and stick together on some level."

Teen program set for April 6

CJN Staff

Some 500 Toronto-area teens will participate in a day of community service and improvement projects as part of J-Serve, the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service, on April 6.

J-Serve is a worldwide tikkun olam program in which more than 10,000 Jewish teens from across North America, Europe and Israel participate in service projects on the same day in communities around the world

J-Serve is the Jewish service component of Youth Service America's annual Global Youth Service Day and coincides with the seventh annual ChangeThe-World Ontario Youth Volunteer Challenge. The province's three-week challenge kicks off April 6 in partnership with Volunteer Canada's National Volunteer Week. Canada's largest celebration of volunteers, volunteerism and civic participation.

The J-Serve Toronto event, hosted by BBYO in partnership with the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is one of more than 100 simultaneous international events aimed at encouraging community building and connections across religious and societal lines.

Participants can choose from more than a dozen options.

This year marks the fifth year Jewish youth from the Toronto area will participate, thanks to funding by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation.

Those interested in participating can find additional information on the J-Serve Toronto website, www.jserve.ca, or by contacting J-Serve Toronto co-ordinator Kevin Goodman at kgoodman@jserve.ca or 416-635-2883 extension 4461.

Leo Baeck hosts IB FORUM

On April 1st & 2nd ~
The Leo Baeck Day School will proudly host an International Baccalaureate (IB) Round Table, providing expert support for language teachers at participating IB schools.

We are pleased to welcome Ms. Margareth Harris, who is traveling from the IB Global Centre in The Hague to lead this discussion on latest practices.

Ms. Harris is the curriculum and assessment manager for the Language and Literature and Language Acquisition of the IB Middle Years Programme (MYP), and will lead sessions in Language and Literature (English) and Language Acquisition (Hebrew and French).

Joining her will be our IB Coordinator Dr. Revalyn Faba Sack, who has held IB leadership roles in Thailand, Norway and China, among others and has collaborated in the global review and design of Language Acquisition IB workshops.

This prestigious training session will be attended by fellow IB schools around southern Ontario, including Toronto French School, Branksome Hall, Ridley College, as well as several other private and public schools, with whom our ongoing collaboration is a source of great pride.

Limited spaces are still available, priority given to teachers of Foreign Languages at IB Schools.

Group tries to raise funds to fight case in Supreme Court

Councillor backs TTC opposition to 'anti-Israel' ad

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Toronto City Councillor James Pasternak is urging the city's legal department to fight a court challenge to the Toronto Transit Commission's decision to bar an anti-Israeli ad from the transit authority's property and vehicles.

Pasternak said the authors of an ad, called "Disappearing Palestine," are promising to challenge the TTC's decision in court.

"It is our understanding that Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME) is trying to raise $50,000 to take the TTC to the Supreme Court," he said.

The city must be ready "to vigorously defend the TTC's position," he said. "These ads are false, historically inaccurate, demonizing and have no place in the TTC. The city of Toronto does not want world conflict zones re-enacted in our public places."

The ads feature a panel of four maps, below which is a photo of a young person surrounded by Israeli soldiers. A petition accessible on the CJPME website calls on supporters to write to the TTC in favour of the ads, which purport to show "Israel's land grabs and transfer of its civilian population into the occupied Palestinian territories."

CJPME said it raised $35,000 to be able to post the ads in two major Canadian cities.

The TTC turned down the CJPME's first request to place the ads last April.

Pasternak said the TTC did so "because they contained statements which could incite discrimination against members of the Jewish and Israeli communities. This violated the TTC's advertising policy... It is certainly not in keeping with the city's efforts to be a respectful and tolerant space. Nor does it follow the TTC's mandate to ensure passengers 'feel safe and secure' on Commission property."

A review board upheld the decision in October.

Pasternak said it was important for the TTC to fight any court challenge to its advertising policy. Otherwise, the transit authority could lose control over the type of ads it would permit.

"If this group is successful, it [would] set a very dangerous precedent where the public transit system could be littered by ads," Pasternak asserted.

CJPME said it "expects to have to go to court in the coming weeks/months to ensure that the 'Disappearing Palestine' ads go up in the TTC."

It called on supporters to provide financial assistance for the endeavour.

In addition to its transit advertising campaign, CJPME supports an economic boycott of Israel, it calls on performers to avoid appearing in Israel, and it has accused Israel of practising apartheid.

CJPME describes itself as "a secular, non-partisan pan-Canadian grassroots organization with about 43,000 supporters across Canada, of whom about 4,000 are in the GTA."

Last year, the Palestine Awareness Coalition successfully placed a "Disappearing Palestine" ad in Vancouver's TransLink transit system that included the caption, "5 Million Palestinians are Classified as Refugees by the UN."

In 2006 the B.C. Court of Appeal overturned a TransLink policy of rejecting partisan ads. TransLink had previously refused to carry political advertisements from the B.C. Teachers Federation and the Canadian Federation of Students.

UJA preparing to launch community cookbook

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Is your bubbie from Brazil? Is your aunt from Iraq? Or maybe your mother is from Morocco?

United Jewish Appeal's Kitchen Cabinet team wants to hear from you.

UJA Women's Philanthropy Division hopes to empower Toronto's diverse Jewish community one recipe at a time in its community-wide recipe search.

Its looking for contributions to its Bathurst Street Kitchen Cookbook, scheduled to be published next January, which it hopes will be a repository of go-to recipes, a modern-day culinary resource of Jewish Toronto's favourite dishes.

Kitchen Cabinet co-chairs Elisa Morton-Palter and Karine Krieger have gathered a group of volunteers that includes Lissie Sanders, Naomi Oelbaum and Brenlee Gales. Chairs of the recipe review committee are Carolyn Tanner-Cohen and Bonny Reichert. Chair of the recipe hunters and gatherers committee is Daniella Kuhl.

"The Bathurst Street Kitchen aspires to become a culinary legacy by and for Toronto's Jewish community. This will be a cookbook and resource that is used for cooking and not just for looking," Morton-Palter said.

The committee has reached out to every segment and ethnicity in the community in every part of the city and offered them the opportunity to participate.

"We have reached out to all of the Jewish communities – Peruvian, Moroccan, Israeli, Indian, Russian, Latin, Ethiopian and Orthodox – in our great city," said Kuhl.

"This will be the first-ever Toronto Jewish community cookbook," Morton-Palter said with pride. "The goal of the cookbook is for Jewish Toronto to feel there is a place for them."

It will include favourite recipes for Jewish holidays – old and new, healthy and not so healthy – such as the best appetizers, soups, salads, sauces, sides, mains and desserts, from the traditional to the contemporary and everything in between.

Aside from culinary guidance, the cookbook will provide clues about the various sub-communities themselves.

"We have enlisted two women who were former chairs of the Toronto Jewish Archives to help us tell the story of the community through archival photography," Sanders said.

"There will be a story that goes along the bottom of the cookbook that will show the community by illustrations and will talk about how the community has evolved."

The committee expects to receive some 1,000 recipes and will include 250 to 300 recipes in the final product.

"We won't be able to publish every recipe, but we will publish the name of everyone who contributed, whether their recipe was used or not," Morton-Palter said.

"If we have five chicken soup recipes submitted, we might do a taste test to decide which goes in. We are asking to have a family member or friend taste test the recipe themselves to make sure it comes out as beautifully as when you make it yourself."

Proceeds from the cookbook will support UJA programs that help women and children. "We would love it for the cookbook to go into the homes of every new immigrant, newly married couples, and to be part of a welcome wagon for UJA Women's Philanthropy," said Sanders. "An online sub-website of UJA Federation [of Greater Toronto] will be added to include the recipes that didn't make the book, with online suggestions, such as what to serve for your Shabbat dinner."

Deadline for submissions is April 7. To contribute your best recipe, visit www.jewishtoronto.com/recipe.

First Jewish MP to hold portfolio

Joe Oliver becomes federal finance minister

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Joe Oliver became Canada's first Jewish finance minister last week.

He took his oath of office in a discreet March 19 mini Tory cabinet shuffle at Rideau Hall, which gave one of the country's most important posts to a man who made his name on Bay Street, but is a relative political neophyte in Ottawa.

Oliver, who turns 74 in May, succeeded Jim Flaherty, who stepped down the previous day from the cabinet post he held for eight years. Flaherty had been reported to be facing health issues over the last year.

Oliver, who represents the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, is one of three Jewish MPs on Parliament Hill. The others are Liberal Irwin Cotler (Mount Royal) and Conservative Mark Adler (York Centre).

"It's a great day," was all that Oliver reportedly said as he arrived for his swearing-in. There was no press conference afterward.

In a statement issued later that day, he said, "I'm honoured that Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper has appointed me to continue on our low-tax plan for jobs and growth as Canada's minister of finance. I am firmly committed to continuing our Conservative government's steady course of creating jobs and growing the economy in all regions of Canada.

Joe Oliver is sworn in as finance minister last week.

"Although our economic fundamentals are strong, we must protect our gains in the face of global economic uncertainty."

Oliver will "continue his government's work to create jobs, strengthen the Canadian economy and balance the budget by 2015," Harper said in a statement issued by his office earlier in the day.

On hand for the swearing-in were Harper, Gov. Gen. David Johnston, MP Greg Rickford (Kenora), who took over as natural resources minister, Oliver's previous post, and Ed Holder (London West), who became minister of state for science and technology.

Oliver was first elected in May 2011, defeating Liberal incumbent and former cabinet minister Joe Volpe by several thousand votes. He was quickly named natural resources minister, succeeding Christian Paradis, and spent much of the last three years focused on energy issues, including supporting the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.

The finance appointment represented a prestigious promotion within cabinet.

Born and raised in Montreal to a dentist father and teacher mother, he earned arts and civil law degrees at McGill University and then an MBA at the Harvard Graduate School of Business.

He went on to a 40-year career in the financial sector as an investment banker with Merrill Lynch, executive director of the Ontario Securities Commission, and as CEO of the Investment Dealers Association of Canada.

Oliver has been a strong supporter of Israel and has spoken and been active in the Jewish community, including as a board member at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

He has visited Israel six times, including three trips as natural resources minister. His latest came in January when he accompanied Harper on the latter's first visit to the Jewish state, at which time Oliver took part in meetings and roundtable discussions with Israeli business leaders on bilateral issues involving technology and innovation.

Oliver is currently married to Golda Goldman, has two sons, Jeffrey and David, two step-sons, Eric and Jeremy.

Canadian was part of plan to capture Mengele

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An ill-fated plan some 30 years ago to capture Dr. Josef Mengele, know in Auschwitz as the Angel of Death, might have cost Ethan Rubinstein his life if the mission hadn't been aborted at the last minute.

Rubinstein is a Winnipeg doctor who spends most of his life tracking down viruses. But the head of the infectious diseases unit at the University of Manitoba's Department of Internal Medicine has in the past had a semi-secret side to him. And one of those secrets was brought to light by Israeli writer Yossi Melman in a recent edition of the Jerusalem Report.

Mengele was the doctor who determined who would live and who would die at Auschwitz. He also led a team of doctors who conducted medical experiments on many of the prisoners. After the war, Mengele disappeared. It was long rumoured that he had escaped to South America and was living under a series of aliases. He drowned while swimming off the Brazilian coast in 1979 and was buried under a false name, but his remains were disinterred and positively identified by forensic examination in 1985.

However, Rubinstein and a team of former Mossad agents did not know that Mengele was already dead when they were recruited in 1983 to capture him and bring him back to Israel for trial.

In a recent interview with Rubinstein in his office, the former Israeli paratrooper acknowledged that he was employed by the Mossad in various activities in his younger days.

"I still enjoy adventure," he said.

During his time working with the Mossad, Rubinstein met Mossad operative Peter Zvi Malkin, a member of the team that captured Adolf Eichmann, smuggled him out of Argentina and brought him to Israel to stand trial for his crimes against the Jewish People and humanity.

In 1983, Yossi Melman wrote, a lawyer in Paraguay named Carlos told a visiting Dutch journalist that he knew where Mengele was being hidden and he would be prepared to reveal the location for a hefty price. While the Mossad wasn't interested in following up, Malkin, by then retired and living in New York, was.

Malkin met with Carlos. The former Mossad agent put together an off-the-book team of former Mossad people, former Israeli air force pilots, a

Holiday Chicken

2 (3 lb / 1.5 kg) chickens, each cut into 8 pieces
Salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp (30 mL) mixed dried basil and oregano or Italian seasoning
2–3 tbsp (30–45 mL) minced garlic
¾ cup (185 mL) chopped dried apricots
½ cup (125 mL) coarsely chopped sun-dried tomatoes (dry packed)
¼ cup (60 mL) balsamic vinegar
¼ cup (60 mL) honey
2 tbsp (30 mL) olive oil
½ cup (125 mL) white wine
2 bay leaves

GARNISH
Chopped parsley

Grease a large roast pan or line it with parchment paper. Rinse the chicken pieces well and pat them dry with paper towels. Trim the excess fat. Place in the prepared roast pan and season the pieces on both sides with the salt, pepper, dried herbs, and garlic. Add the apricots and sun-dried tomatoes to the pan. In a bowl, combine the vinegar, honey, and olive oil and drizzle evenly over the chicken pieces, coating them thoroughly. Pour the wine around the chicken and add the bay leaves. Cover the pan and refrigerate for several hours or up to 2 days. Preheat the oven to 350°F (180°C). Uncover the chicken and let it stand at room temperature for 30 minutes, and then place it in the oven. Bake for about 1½ hours, basting often. When done, the skin will be golden and the juices will run clear when the chicken is pierced with a fork. Remove the bay leaves and discard. Using a slotted spoon, transfer the chicken mixture to a serving platter. Drizzle some of the pan juices over the chicken and garnish with parsley. Pour the remaining pan juices in a gravy bowl, skim off the fat, and serve on the side.

Yield: 8 servings

Hate speech change not intended to silence Israel critics, CIJA says

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Advocates for Palestinian rights are obsessed with Israel and are delirious to think a change to Canada's hate speech laws are intended to silence critics of Israel, says a high-ranking official with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

"These people must also think Elvis, JFK and Marilyn Monroe are residing on a desert island somewhere," Richard Marceau, CIJA's general counsel and senior government adviser, said in a phone interview from Ottawa.

He emphasized what is being proposed as a change to Bill C-13, the federal government's proposed cyberbullying law, "is nothing new. It just brings into line, with several provincial antibullying and hate laws, section 718.2, subsection A, subsection I of the Criminal Code of Canada."

In a story in the March 20 edition of the Halifax Chronicle Herald, Paul MacLeod of the newspaper's Ottawa bureau reported that the change to Bill C-13 would expand the definition of groups that can be the subject of hate propaganda under the Criminal Code. The code now lists people distinguished by colour, race, religion, ethnic origin, or sexual orientation. Bill C-13 adds age, sex, and mental or physical disability, as well as national origin.

Some legal experts, Marceau included, say this is likely a mere housecleaning amendment to bring the Criminal Code in line with the wording of other statutes.

However, Seriously Free Speech, a British Columbia-based group formed to defend critics of Israel, sees it as a backdoor way to crack down on criticism of Israel and they plan to be vocal about it.

Speaking by telephone from British Columbia, the organization's co-chair, Brian Campbell, told The CJN there has been "a pattern of the Conservative government equating criticism of Israel as a political entity with anti-Semitism. Adding national origin to the hate speech section of the Criminal Code makes it possible to use that section as criticism of Israel. There's a definite tone and climate to the change [to the law]."

He said it would take a change of government or a change in the policy toward Israel to alter the thinking of Seriously Free Speech, formed in 2007 in response to a lawsuit brought by then-CanWest newspapers against a parody of Israel in a Vancouver Sun story.

Included in its list of principles, taken from its website, the organization states: "We reject all forms of hate speech, including antisemitism, Islamophobia and racism."

It also claims: "We believe that political criticism of Israel's policies and actions, including characterizing it as an 'apartheid state' or campaigning for boycott, divestment and sanctions, is legitimate political speech, the expression of which must be protected. Such speech does not constitute anti-semitism."

Campbell said his group "will be publicly opposing [the change contained in Bill C-13]. We believe it is more than just housecleaning. We still believe that it is an attempt to make criticism of Israel hate speech."

In a statement, the Department of Justice said the amendment is designed to match the wording of a protocol from the Council of Europe, a human rights organization. The change would have the Criminal Code mirror the council's definitions of racist or xenophobic material.

In fact, the code already refers to national origin in a section about sentencing. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms also mentions national origin.

But some pro-Palestinian groups and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association say they're skeptical, partially because of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's recent speech in the Knesset in which he referred to events such as Israeli Apartheid Week as "the face of the new anti-Semitism."

Israeli Apartheid Week calls for boycotts, divestment and sanctions directed against Israel until it changes its policies toward the Palestinians.

"In much of the western world, the old hatred has been translated into more sophisticated language for use in polite society," Harper said.

"People who would never say they hate and blame the Jews for their own failings or the problems of the world instead declare their hatred of Israel and blame the only Jewish state for the problems of the Middle East."

Some critics see Harper's speech, and the hate law change, as part of a trend to directly equate criticism of Israel with anti-Semitism.

Critics also raise concerns that the hate-speech amendment is packaged under a cyberbullying bill rather than being debated on its own merits.

Canadian camps get philanthropic funds

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Stuart Guttman could not have sounded happier.

The director of Camp Massad in the Laurentians had just learned that his Jewish camp would for the second straight year be one of only two in the province – the other is Camp Kinneret-Biluim – to receive $1,000 each in funding from the New York-based Jewish Teen Funders Network (JTFN) to develop self-created philanthropy programming.

"Last year was our first year," Guttman told The CJN. "This year we will also be very involved."

According to its website, the JTFN (jtfn.org), which was created in 2006, is the "central address for Jewish youth philanthropy programs across North America," responsible for creating to date about 150 Jewish teen and philanthropy programs. Most of the JTFN's own funding comes comes from the Maimonides Fund based in New Jersey.

Outside Quebec, only five other Jewish summer camps in Canada – B'nai Brith Jewish Community Camp in Kenora, Ont., Camp Ramah and Camp George in Ontario, Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia, and JCC Camp Shalom in British Columbia – are among the 50 in the United States and Canada deemed eligible for JTFN funding this year.

More significantly, suggested Guttman, it points to the fact that camp is often the starting point for Jewish community involvement that has a realistic chance of lasting a lifetime.

"Camp often sets the curriculum," Guttman said. "Jewish camp has emerged as one of the strongest identifiers for continuing community involvement."

In the case of 67-year-old Camp Massad, which is modern Orthodox in its approach and steeped in Hebrew language, JTFN involvement has included trips to the city to see Jewish agencies and even a visit to the camp by Federation CJA representatives.

The teens at the camp then decide – guided by Jewish values – what the best use of the money will be through the "foundation" they create. Camp Massad also has its own leadership training and development and counsellor training programs that complement the JTFN initiative.

In general, Guttman said, Quebec's four most established Jewish community camps – Massad, Kinneret-Biluim, Y Country Camp, and Camp B'nai Brith – are holding their own and consult monthly, even though each is seeking to attract new campers for their own camps from the same Jewish community pool.

Guttman said the camps also get support from the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre, and an official from one of the camps – but representing them all – visits Israel annually to help make Israel a continuing touchstone of the camping experience.

"It's not as if there are any real trade secrets," Guttman said. "We have open lines of communication. The idea is that camp is for everybody, but not every Jewish camp is for every child."

Mission aborted after tip received

former special forces soldier and Rubinstein, who was assigned the task of drugging Mengele – once the group nabbed him – interrogating him and watching over him during the flight to Israel. A Jewish businessman in Panama agreed to underwrite the operation financially and provide the plane.

"Peter [Malkin] and I were longtime friends and saw each other frequently," said Rubinstein who, at the time, was a researcher in infectious diseases at the Sheba Medical Center near Tel Aviv. "I went along for the adventure and for revenge."

The team was making its final preparations for the trip, Rubinstein said, when Malkin received an anonymous tip that Carlos was lying and they were heading into a trap. In true spy-story style, Malkin broke into Carlos' hotel room and found evidence to confirm the tip.

"It's a good thing that we aborted the mission," Rubinstein said.

As for Carlos, Melman notes that Malkin invited Carlos to a meeting in Paris a couple of months after the aborted operation. The Paraguayan was never seen again.

"I don't know for sure," Rubinstein said. "But I would like to think that our guys took care of him."

Rubinstein came to Winnipeg in 2005 to head a new HIV/AIDS treatment program for Manitobans suffering from the disease. He noted that in western countries, HIV/AIDS is now a chronic condition. In Africa and elsewhere, it is often still a fatal disease.

He is also doing research treatments for anthrax and MRSA (methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus), a bacterium that causes infections in different parts of the body and is tougher to treat than most strains of staph because it's resistant to some commonly used antibiotics.

Open dialogue helps navigate Mideast conflict

Talia Bensoussan
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

On March 13 at the McGill University Faculty of Law, more than 40 students attended a student-run initiative led by Max Libman and myself that promoted dialogue about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The roundtable discussion event was called "Perspectives: Fostering progressive and peaceful dialogue on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." The program was initiated in response to extreme views, both pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian, that had been expressed about Israeli Apartheid Week posters displayed around McGill's campus. The posters presented a one-sided view of the conflict using statistics and graphic imagery about the situation in Gaza and the West Bank. They were on display all day without a spokesperson present to provide context to the words and pictures or alternate views about the conflict.

As first-year law students, Max and I felt strongly that rhetoric, on both sides of the debate, does nothing to promote the sort of progressive discussion that could help bring a resolution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Together, we decided to hold an open dialogue in which students were welcome to share their ideas and perspectives about the conflict in the Middle East. All viewpoints were shared in a neutral setting with the goal of promoting peace, democracy and respect for others.

Law students with backgrounds in business, international development, peace and conflict studies, history, comparative religion and political science attended the discussion. Due to their varied academic backgrounds, students approached the conversation from different angles. For example, students with an economics or finance background spoke about the possibility of sustainable development programs in Gaza. Students who have studied history referred to Israel's legitimate right to exist and to Jews' historical connection to the land. Emphasis was placed on how a political conflict has become an everyday civilian preoccupation. Students creatively grappled with complex issues including a two-state solution, the right of return, the importance of economic development and the value of equality.

The format of the discussion fostered openness and respect. Tamim Al-Afghani, a fellow first-year law student, along with Max and myself, mediated the event. We began by setting out the rules of conduct in order to create an educational environment of collaboration and sharing instead of one of judgment. All perspectives were addressed to the mediators, who managed the flow of dialogue. Although many participants spoke passionately, there was no tolerance for aggressive language or prejudice and generalizations.

As one of the mediators, I was fortunate to be able to truly listen to all perspectives instead of focusing only on my own opinions. Over the course of the discussion, I learned much from my peers.

For example, I learned that language is extremely important when discussing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Words have the ability to evoke emotions, but are also easily misconstrued. On the one hand, some individuals believe that the word "apartheid" is a misrepresentation of the situation in Israel, Gaza and West Bank, while others believe that it is precisely the right word for characterizing the political and social situation there. While some may feel offended by the severity of the word because of its association to South Africa, others believe it evokes the appropriate emotional reaction to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

I also learned that history cannot be removed from the conversation. It is virtually impossible to separate modern-day political tensions from their historical roots. That history, too, evokes emotional responses on both sides of the conflict. Most importantly, I learned that it is possible to conduct a constructive and respectful dialogue about the Middle East. Too often, it is the loudest, most extreme voices that are associated with the conflict. This event showed me that there are many voices in between that are reasonable, intelligent and respectful.

Max and I hope to continue these open discussions in other faculties of law and arts in Montreal in order to share our belief that dialogue, respectful communication, and acceptance are key to finding a just solution in the Middle East. By truly listening to views that differ from one's own view, individuals can expand their knowledge base and increase their level of sensitivity to all sides of the conflict.

Film focuses on violence against women

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A documentary called Honor Diaries, which highlights the plight of oppressed women in Muslim-majority societies, will have its Toronto premier this week.

Gender-equality activist, author and public speaker Raheel Raza, one of the nine women featured in the film, said she hopes the documentary will raise awareness about issues including female genital mutilation, honour-based violence and forced marriages.

"I am a woman living in a country where I have freedom and equality, and I came here for that, but in my country of birth, every woman doesn't have freedom and equality, so I want to be the voice for those who are silenced," said Raza, who is originally from Pakistan.

She said that while she is encouraged by the fact that there is more awareness of the subject today, the problem persists and there is still a "barrier of silence" that needs to be broken.

"When we look at the statistics of the actual violence taking place against women, it's on the rise, unfortunately. I think that in the West it is on the rise because of political correctness. People don't want to speak about it. These are toxic issues that are not easy to talk about. I understand that. But our mandate is to expose, educate and eradicate," Raza said.

"Let me assure you that these tribal practices have crept their way into western countries. So we need to be conscious. When we speak about it happening in other countries, we are creating awareness, and unless we expose these issues, it can happen in our own societies, right here in Canada."

Although the film is centred on the nine female activists, there is one man, Raza's husband, who is featured in the documentary.

"I told the producers about the kind of work we're doing, the activism, and we need the support of men, and I, personally, in my life, could never have done the work that I do without the support of my husband and my sons," she said. "I think it's important for audiences to see that there are Muslim men who are supportive of the cause. That is sort of the lighter side of the film, because it's a very heavy film."

The film focuses on women in Muslim-majority societies, but women of all backgrounds can relate, she added.

The film will be screened March 30 at the Colossus Woodbridge theatre in Vaughan, Ont., at 10 a.m.

Ve'ahavta working to help First Nations

Meanwhile, Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish humanitarian and relief organization, is partnering with Aboriginal communities in the Treaty 3 area to improve the health of First Nations peoples.

With a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation and the support of philanthropist Larry Tanenbaum; Phil Fontaine, former chief of the Assembly of First Nations; and former Prime Minister Paul Martin, Ve'ahavta will send young people to communities in the Kenora area, near the Manitoba border, to support local community health programs.

In interviews with Dan, Sarah Zelcer, Ve'ahavta's director of national and international programs, and Martin, the long-standing ties of the Jewish and First Nations communities were stressed.

"It wasn't that long ago that we were like them, second-class citizens in the countries we live in," Dan said.

The hydro project that Gemini is promoting – it's still seeking bureaucratic approvals – will over time be turned over to local First Nations communities, providing an income stream while encouraging financial self-sufficiency, he said.

"It's much more than just a business deal," Dan continued. "It's trying to help this community become more self reliant. It's taking all the smarts and knowledge we have on Bay Street and applying it to a community that was left to fend for itself without much success."

"It's much more than a project now. It's a lifelong connection to the community," he added.

Zelcer, of Ve'ahavta, said, Bri'ut (Hebrew for health) is a capacity-building program that will co-operate with the Kenora Chiefs Advisory to support community led health promotion programming in seven Anishinabe reserves over the next 3-1/2 years.

The program will see seven graduate students studying public health or social work under the direction of their host communities to promote health.

Michael Dan, second from right, participates in a ceremonial dance with members of the Lac LaCroix First Nations (LLCFN) at a powwow last August. Dan was presented with a hand-sewn deer skin vest for his guidance and friendship. Seen here, from left, are LLCFN elder and shaman Kalvin Ottertail; Chief of the LLCFN Norm Jordan; Dan; and Sequia, Chief Jordan's partner.

"We see Bri'ut as our entry point into building meaningful relationships with Aboriginal communities which are based on partnership, collaboration, mutual respect and trust. Our goal is to develop more programs which focus on supporting Aboriginal communities in Canada in the areas of health and education," Zelcer said.

Ve'ahavta is hoping to involve Toronto synagogues in "a movement within the Jewish community that seeks to better understand the issues affecting Aboriginal Canadians, to build partnerships with Aboriginal communities, and to work hand in hand toward promoting a more equitable Canada."

Contacted at his office in Montreal, Martin noted that "the Canadian Jewish community has for some time shown a great interest in the plight of Canada's indigenous people. This is very much to the credit of the Jewish community."

Martin, who spearheaded the Martin Aboriginal Education Initiative, which includes a five-year pilot project funded in part by the Judith and Lawrence Tanenbaum Family Foundation, said Aboriginal Canadians are the youngest and fastest-growing segment of the Canadian population. He urged young Canadian Jews to "get involved with young Aboriginal Canadians. That will lead to better understanding," he said.

Tanenbaum said his involvement in Native issues can be traced back to a visit to the White Dog Reserve in northern Ontario nearly five years ago. Accompanying Martin at the time, he said he "was moved by what I saw and what heard that day.

"I take great pride that the Jewish community is engaged with and working on behalf of Canada's Aboriginal people in many facets.

"The former Canadian Jewish Congress was deeply involved in programming with First Nations [and] the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs... participated in the Commission on Truth and Reconciliation, as well as mentoring Aboriginal leaders in advocacy and leadership.

"I think we all view this work as part of our community's tradition of tikkun olam. It is very basic, but so essential. We seek to make our community, province and country a better place. It begins with helping others, and it is something that is rooted in the traditions of our people that were taught to me by my parents."

Martin will discuss his education initiatives in Toronto at Holy Blossom Temple on April 10, while Dan is scheduled to speak at Toronto's Temple Emanu-El on April 6 on First Nations' traumatic memory and economic marginalization.

Spitting Israeli wine (a good thing)

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Time was when critics would spit out a nasty word or two about Israeli wine – that is if they mentioned it at all. Recently, they're doing all the sniffing and gurgling and spitting because Israeli wine has come into its own. Today, a virtual tasting of some of the best.

Writing in Business Week, influential wine guru Robert Parker and colleague Mark Squires tasted some "Heavenly Wines from the Holy Land." Squires rated four wines 90 points or higher (i.e., excellent) including Domaine du Castel 2004 Grand Vin (92 points). "This unrefined and unfiltered cab, merlot, and petit verdot blend is beautiful. Aged for 24 months in new French oak, it is bursting with flavour and simply delicious." [http://bit.ly/kwine20]

What are some of the names to watch? Wine Enthusiast named Golan Heights Winery its "2012 New World Winery of the Year," saying that it "continues to raise the standards and improve the image of Israeli wines, emphasizing its high quality and vast potential." Golan Heights produces three brands: Gamla, Golan and Yarden. [bit.ly/kwine21] A year earlier, Hugh Johnson's renowned Pocket Wine Book bestowed a full four stars on Domaine du Castel and 3-4 stars on Yatir, an Israeli boutique winery in Tel Arad. [bit.ly/kwine22]

What sign confirms that an Israeli winemaker is in the big leagues? For Micha Vaadia of Galil Mountain Winery, the sign reads "Costco." As Vaadia explained to the Globe and Mail's Beppi Crosariol, when the giant wholesale club began selling his wines to a general market in the United States – and not just people looking for a Purim or Passover beverage – he knew he had made it. Crosariol adds, "Galil Mountain's wines are very good, among the better offerings in a country with a storied ancient oenological history, but only a recent revival." [bit.ly/kwine23]

And then there's Gary Vaynerchuk, the hyperkinetic host of a wine webcast, justly described as "totally uncorked" by Time magazine. Here's his set-up: "Kosher wines! Are these the most overlooked wines in the world? Maybe, maybe not. But what has happened in the last 36 months has erased decades and years and centuries of atrocious, crapass, disgusting, awful, dirty, unacceptable, undrinkable, pitiful, efforts in the kosher wine section." Watch Vaynerchuk sip, spit and pronounce his verdict on several moderately priced wines. [bit.ly/kwine24]

Vaynerchuk spent a more recent column gurgling on a couple of high-end wines (a 2008 Herzog Clone Six Edition Cabernet at $120 and a 2007 Capcanes La Flor del Flor de Primavera at $80). Let's just say he recommends saving your dollars by drinking the cheaper vino. [bit.ly/kwine25]

How good are Israeli wines? I'll leave the last word to the late Daniel Rogov. "The region surrounding the Sea of Galilee is not producing wines to rival those of the great chateaux of Bordeaux. That is not the issue. What is important is that a group of highly talented chefs and winemakers are moving in all of the right directions, and whether one lives in or pays a visit to Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa or any of the more provincial cities or towns of Israel, no one will suffer from a lack of excellent food and fine wine." [bit.ly/kwine26]

You gotta have faith!

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

On my recent trip to Montreal, I had the great privilege to be blessed by the Tosher Rebbe.

For those who don't know who he is, the Tosher Rebbe, Rabbi Meshulam Feish Segal-Loewy, was born in Nyirtass, Hungary, in 1921, and relocated to Montreal after World War II.

Why would a Sephardi rabbi from Vancouver visit a Hungarian rebbe in Montreal?

The answer is simple. Sephardi Jews always practised their Judaism through simplicity and faith. My mother recalls that as a child, whenever the Hacham walked by, people were hurrying to kiss his hand and get his blessing. My late father mentioned to me on numerous occasions how as a child he used to accompany Rabbi Shlomo Hacohen, the av beit din of Oujda, Morocco, to the Minchah service. There was a certain awe and decorum when the Hacham was present. His background and philosophy weren't important. What mattered was that he represented the word of God, and that meant we owed him respect. This straightforward conviction was indoctrinated from a young age.

We often forget to mention the value of faith.

The main aspect of the divine service of the person in this world is to clarify and make strong his faith in God until it will be clear and refined in his eyes, the truth of the existence of the Creator.

All the mitzvot that a person performs are done in order to strengthen this faith, as it is written (Psalms 119), "All your mitzvot are faith," meaning that all the mitzvot must bring the person to the revelation of faith, so that he will merit to believe in God truthfully."

Rebbe Nachman of Breslev taught that we must pray for everything we need: "God may give you food and clothing and everything else you need even though you do not ask for them. But then you are like an animal. God gives every creature its bread without being asked. He can also provide you in the same manner. However, if you do not draw your life through prayer, then you are no different than an animal. A man must draw all the necessities of life from God through prayer alone.

"When it comes to matters pertaining to this world, it is never possible to be completely satisfied. If you want physical pleasures, you will always be lacking something. For example, someone might be able to satisfy his desire for food, but he will not have the honour he would wish. Regardless of what you do have, you will always be deficient in some area. But when you make it your main ambition to serve the Almighty, you will feel a sense of wholeness. The pleasure of serving the Creator is so intense that it is above any other pleasures. Hence, when you have this virtue, you are missing nothing."

Let us all internalize this crucial lesson in emunah and live our lives in a more fulfilling manner.

From performance to tranformation

Class Act
Daniel Held

Like any Jewish parent, I couldn't help but shep naches when I went to my daughter's preschool Purim party. There she was, dressed in her bumble bee costume, clapping and singing and shaking her gregger to Purim songs.

Now, a little less than a month away from seder night, the pressure is on to get her Mah Nishtanah skills to match her Old McDonald expertise.

As Jewish parents, we thrive on our children's Jewish performances. I grow a little taller when my daughter calls grape juice "Shabbat juice," when she struggles through a brachah, or when she takes a siddur from the pews in shul, opens the pages and mumbles incoherently.

This pride, of course, isn't limited to preschool. In the coming years, there will be siddur services and stunted Hebrew conversations with Israeli cousins, model seders and choir festivals, Israeli dance exhibits and, a long way down the road, a bat mitzvah. For each, we'll pull out our camcorder, iPhone or whatever the latest recording device will be, jostle for position with other eager parents, smile, shed a few tears and think to ourselves, "Wow, we're so proud of the Jew our daughter has become."

The performances are wonderful family moments and offer opportunities for us to support and praise our children's Jewish growth, but they cannot stand alone.

Judaism is not about performance. It's about transformation.

Too often Jewish education – in day or supplementary schools, camps or other settings of learning – is boiled down to a performance. For educators and students, this means hours upon hours spent rehearsing, rote memorization, transliteration and choreography. For parents, this means praise of a product rather than a process.

Viewing Jewish education through the lens of a series of performances belittles the transformative nature of the endeavour. Jewish education is about helping learners consider Judaism in the context of their lived experience: teaching children to integrate Jewish values and knowledge sets into their everyday lives.

In addition to costumes and songs on Purim, our children need to consider the triumph of the Jews over Haman and realize the challenges and opportunities of Jewish life in a Diaspora. While they're learning the Mah Nishtanah, they must grapple with the difficult journey from slavery to freedom As they prepare for a siddur ceremony, they should reflect on the place of prayer in their own lives. And when it comes to a bar mitzvah, they must deal with the realities of adult Jewish life.

While educators strive to use performative Judaism as a pathway toward the transformative, these lessons are best driven home by family.

In addition to smiling while re-watching videos on my iPhone, I need to ask my daughter about the meaning of the performances, experiences and lessons she learns in school, the values she is acquiring and how they apply to her life.

It's not enough to be proud that she calls grape juice "Shabbat juice." Rather, we have to start teaching her what makes Shabbat special, beyond the juicy treats. Only through these conversations can we shift from performative to transformative Judaism.

Worrisome bar and bat mitzvah trends

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

Congregants send me links to articles and videos of outrageous bar and bat mitzvah parties. You've seen them. The glitter and glam, the celebrity bands, the curvy professional dancers, the bar mitzvah boy jumping out of a cake. Usually when people send me this stuff, they include a note like: "Can you believe this?" or "What's become of us?" And yet we can't take our eyes off it. Like a car accident, it's horrifying and strangely compelling at the same time.

To be honest, over-the-top parties don't worry me as much as some other trends I see:

• A list, B list: Inviting guests to the party, but not the service. The main event is at the Torah, when bar and bat mitzvahs take their place among the Jewish People. That's the "Shehechiyanu moment" everyone wants to witness. Parties are great fun, but that moment when everyone huddles around the Torah? Priceless.

• Performance without learning: Take a crash course with a private tutor and anyone can learn to read Torah. But the honour of reading Torah on behalf of the congregation is fully received when there has been regular attachment and learning. Our kids are confident when they're at home in the synagogue and feel they're our trusted and treasured representatives on the bimah.

• Destination bar and bat mitzvahs: Some travel to read Torah in an old synagogue in Europe or the Caribbean, or in Israel. These family vacations are terrific and memorable, but they're private and "over there." I always encourage families to make a memory here, too, so that the child knows Judaism happens right where you live and that there's a community right here that needs you and cares about you. Done right, the two ceremonies – here and there – can reinforce one another in important ways.

• DIY bar and bat mitzvahs: Filling a venue with family and friends for a private affair misses the mark when it comes to a bar or bat mitzvah child. The whole purpose is to teach and to show that in Jewish life you don't "do it yourself." As a bar or bat mitzvah, you do it with, for and because of the Jewish People. As a bar or bat mitzvah, you never go it alone. Jewish life is highly personal, but not private.

Above all, we need to remember that a bar or bat mitzvah is a person, not an event.

In his book, To Have or To Be, Erich Fromm, the psychologist and social philosopher, challenges us to use verbs of being rather than verbs of having. Rather than say, "I have three children," we can say, "I am a parent to three children." Rather than say, "I'm having my bar or bat mitzvah at my synagogue," we can say, "I am becoming a bar or bat mitzvah. And I will be called to the Torah at my synagogue." Rather than, "We are having the party at such-and-such a venue," we can say, "We are celebrating at…" It's a valuable exercise. Statements of ownership come more easily than statements of being, but statements of being get to the heart of who we are and who we are not.

When one of our bar or bat mitzvahs takes to the bimah, time is suspended for a moment. You can see it on the faces of the parents. They are in another world. Awestruck. It's a profound moment when past, present and future collide, when the individual and the Jewish People turn to one another and strengthen one another in whole-hearted embrace.

When everyone's eyes are on the bar or bat mitzvah, I put my eyes on the parents. That rare look on their faces is more than priceless. That's the gaze of the sacred.

Itzhak Perlman

Famed violinist prepares for Toronto concert

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

On March 31 at 7:30 p.m., violinist Itzhak Perlman takes to the stage at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall for a benefit concert in support of Chai Lifeline, the Canadian arm of the international organization that provides social, emotional, and financial support to seriously ill children and their families.

The Israeli-born, New York-based virtuoso will be performing with Cantor Yitzchak Helfgot, the renowned soloist and chief cantor of the Park East Synagogue in New York.

Tickets to the Chai Lifeline concert are available at www.chaiconcert.com.

What will the audience hear you and Cantor Helfgot perform?

They are going to hear a variety of Jewish music. It's going to be a little cantorial music, a little popular Jewish music for voice and violin and there is going to be some traditional prayers and some klezmer.

Are you playing with an orchestra?

There will be some music with orchestra, some with a small band and some will be with just piano and bass. I think that's what makes the show so nice, there is a lot of variety, with different sounds and styles. You know, I myself enjoy it.

Have you and the cantor worked together before?

Oh yes, many times and we have gone on tour together. We have been in Toronto together as well, last year.

How does being Jewish influence your art, if at all?

I don't know if it influences my art. I feel my art is my art, and I'm Jewish and it is two separate things. I don't think because I'm Jewish my art is a certain way. Obviously, a concert like this, is because I am Jewish. It is not like I was to play the Beethoven violin concerto, I would say I am playing it in a certain way because I am Jewish. I don't think so. I'm playing it a certain way because I'm me. This concert, which is something I grew up with, obviously has a lot to do with the fact that I'm Jewish. When I was growing up in Israel, I listened to this kind of music, so it was part of my growing up. That definitely not only influences the way I play this, but the fact that I do like to hear the sound of a cantorial voice together with my violin.

Have you had a professional moment that you have thought, am I ever lucky?

Yes all the time. Every time that I play and something comes out beautifully, or even when I listen to music that moves me, I always say I am so lucky. I cry certain times when I listen to music that moves me…my God, this is something, that I can actually have such a reaction to music.

You often appeared on American television at a young age, exposing classical music to the masses. How did this affect your career?

The media and television definitely affected my career. It was just a question of exposure. When you play a concert in a hall that seats 3,000 people, which is a pretty nice size hall, then you play five minutes on television that exposes you to millions of people, it is obvious that the media is extremely important in making sure the music is on the front burner of peoples' ears. The way my career started, in rather a funny way was appearing on the Ed Sullivan Show when I was 13 years old, so my kind of karma if you will, had a lot to do with TV. I have been doing a lot of public television and going on talk shows and it greatly affects a career.

What has it been like to perform alongside some of those who have inspired and influenced you musically?

I performed with conductors as I was growing up. I am a little young for the older conductors and a little old for the younger conductors. I'm in the twilight zone of age. I recorded with Carlo Maria Giulini, who I admired so much. And I performed with conductors like George Schulte or Pierre Boulez.

Playing with Isaac Stern, who I grew up listening to, or to Yehudi Menuhin —you always take something from people that you hear. The important thing is to use it and make it your own and not to say, I admire this person and I am going to do exactly what this person is doing. I have problems with students, sometimes they think they have to do exactly what this other person does that sometimes can be dangerous. Isaac Stern was already performing when I was five years old. So when you grow up and you perform with the same person that you heard through your childhood, it is a very special thing.

You've lent your talents to film soundtracks…do you have plans to do more of that?

The film soundtracks that I have done were not a plan. I was approached. Basically, it is up to the composer and the sound he wants to hear on a movie track. With Schindler's List for example, John Williams said to me, 'I can hear a violin and I'm just wondering if you would be able to do it.' Of course, when I knew the whole story and the subject, it was a no brainer to do something like that.

You and your wife Toby are planning a special event this summer called "Bows & Batons: 4 Days of Music & Music Appreciation with Itzhak Perlman and Friends" from August 18-22 in Saratoga Springs, New York. Tell us about it.

My wife started a music program and this summer it will be the 20th anniversary. It is for talented young string players between the ages of 12 to 18. There is also chamber music as well, for older kids. That is something that I have been involved in, it is a program that is all year around.

For this gathering in Saratoga, my wife is the director of the program, and we will be having some people from the program. The audience will be there for some interesting chamber music and what goes on behind the chamber music. We call it an informational musical event. Also, I will be conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra on one of those days, so they will be exposed to both a rehearsal and the concert.

Your wife Toby is a fellow violinist, have you ever performed together?

We met at a music camp, which actually inspired her music program. We were both studying with the same teachers. We have never performed together.

Are any of your five children musical?

Four out of the five are musical. I have a daughter who is a professional pianist and another who plays the flute, and one who sings and a son who plays in rock bands. They are into it, although not all of them are professional in music, but they are all musicians.

Itzhak Perlman

Your classical music fans may not know that you also play jazz and have recorded with Canada's late jazz pianist Oscar Peterson, what was that like?

I am not a jazz player. I try to play jazz. Jazz is not my day job. That thing I did with Oscar Peterson was simply because I admired Oscar Peterson because he was an amazing, incredible pianist and I always loved to hear him play. When the opportunity arised, I thought it would be just nice to do something together. He was very kind to bear with me.

After a couple of takes with this recording I tried to improvise. Improvising in jazz is quite common, however improvising for a classical musician is something not done usually. One time I was improvising and our director said, you know it sounds a little bit like klezmer and that is the first time that I actually discovered that I could actually play klezmer, when I was actually trying to do something in jazz and it sounded maybe a little too Jewish. That was a side effect of trying to do jazz.

You have family from Toronto including a distant cousin, TV personality Howie Mandel.

I've never met him, but we've exchanged a couple of letters.

When you are not traveling the world performing, what do you do for fun when you unpack your violin case?

Just spending time with my family. Between the five children, we have grandchildren and I like spending time with them. Not often, but sometimes I go to a sporting event or to the movies. I just try to stay put at home. For me that is the best way of spending time, is not to travel.

Get your game on for Baycrest!

Are you a Scrabble master or a Monopoly tyrant? Or maybe you're a Trivial Pursuit pop culture savant? Whatever your game, the inaugural Game Night for Baycrest will launch on Saturday April 5, 2014. This one-night-only, unique event will challenge your skills while helping raise awareness about Baycrest.

The brainchild of the GTA's Young Leaders for Baycrest committee, Game Night is dedicated to promoting Baycrest's innovations in care, brain health and as a world-renowned research facility on dementia to a new generation of supporters.

"A healthy brain is a must at any age. We wanted to do something different and fun to raise awareness about Baycrest and came up with a board game night," explains committee co-chair Erica Godfrey. The idea took off. Dozens of households across Toronto and New York are signed on to host a Game Night.

So how do you play? Interested volunteers are being asked to open their homes and host 10 to 20 friends and/or family members for an informal, relaxed night of gaming and talk about Baycrest. Gamers will hear all about Baycrest's work and impact in Ontario and around the world, and why taking care of your brain when you're young can help you live a longer, healthier life.

Committee member Lauren Greisman says her generation needs to rethink what Baycrest means to all demographics, not just older adults. "As younger adults, we have a duty to educate our friends about Baycrest and what it has to offer, because a lot of people only see it as a home for the elderly. It's not. It's time for our generation to get more involved," she says.

Generating more support for Baycrest, whether through volunteerism or donations, is the primary goal of Game Night, Hailey Remer, a committee co-chair adds. "Ultimately, it's about looking out for the collective future of all community members," Remer says.

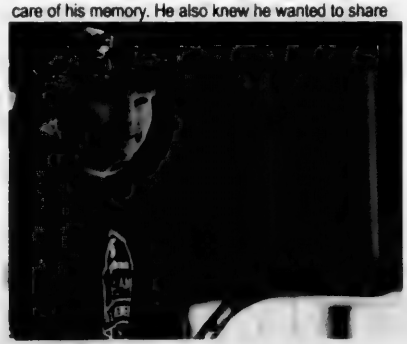
McSorley credits Baycrest for helping him fight memory loss

Want to know why Wayne Gretzky's former on-ice bodyguard chooses to support Baycrest?

After retiring in 2000, Marty McSorley began feeling the effects of a punishing 17-year NHL career sometime around 2009 and realized he had to begin taking better care of his memory. He also knew he wanted to share his experiences with pro and amateur hockey players so they too could take better care of their brains. Five years ago, when his lapses in memory and diminishing hand-eye co-ordination began, so did his relationship with Baycrest Health Sciences.



Marty McSorley

McSorley, who will be 51 in May, has taken part in the annual Scotiabank Baycrest Pro-Am since 2009 as a member of the NHL Alumni Association. Now in its ninth year, the 2014 Pro-Am takes place May 1 – 3. "It's a natural fit," he says.

"With the Scotiabank Baycrest Pro-Am, I have the best of many worlds. I get a chance to play, which I've always loved to do. I love the game, and to get the opportunity to sit in a locker room with real fans who have raised a lot of money for Baycrest research and care, and to talk about the game with them is just terrific," says McSorley. "I'm a hockey fan first, and Pro-Am participants are the same. So I get a chance to share my love of the game with those guys. Add to that all the alumni who play, like Guy Carbonneau, Paul Coffey, Wendel [Clark] and Dougie [Gilmour], I enjoy being around them and have a lot of respect for them."

Equally as important, he has come to learn about how to deal with his own symptoms from head trauma, both through Baycrest research as well as through his friendships with doctors and researchers here over the years.

"Personally, I'll sometimes be driving down a highway and I'll have trouble remembering where I'm supposed to go. I've sometimes pulled off the road and called my wife to check where I'm supposed to be. Or I'll walk into a room and not know why I was there," he says. "These days, if I'm going out to buy some things or do some errands, I have to make notes for myself to remind me where I'm going and what I'm doing. And then there are the little things that strike me, from forgetting my wife's maiden name to how to spell certain elementary words. Some days are harder than others and that's my reality. And I'd never have thought twice about these things if it hadn't have been for my exposure to Baycrest."

Holiday connection - A message from the Baycrest Foundation's Interim President

Passover is around the corner.

Baycrest is a special place year round, it is particularly so during the holidays. In my discussions with donors, clients and community members, time and again I hear how we've managed to create a special environment for those who wish to partake in Passover traditions, particularly the seder, the festive holiday meal. Children and grandchildren of aging parents and grandparents tell me they cherish this aspect of what we do, because they see how the Baycrest family embraces their own and provides a spiritual lift and care during this time.

I remember when my own family members became too ill to go to synagogue or enjoy a seder at home. It was a tremendous comfort to know they could continue to participate meaningfully in ceremonies along with other residents and to see how much they welcomed being part of their new, extended Baycrest family. They were able to feel completely engaged despite their illnesses, since during the holiday each floor of the hospital, Apotex and the day centres hold their own Passover programs for staff, clients and their families, where elements of the holiday are explored with residents.

Baycrest's dedication to nurturing spiritual needs is just one of the unique ways we maintain a strong connection to our cultural beginnings while simultaneously looking forward to the future of care.

In the stories that follow, we celebrate the Rotman Research Institute's 25th Anniversary and highlight the exciting ways we continue to engage donors and supporters of all ages and walks of life, from our 9th annual Pro-Am hockey tournament to our new Game Night initiative - led by a devoted younger generation of Baycrest leaders - to a warm friendraiser in Florida.

As you prepare for your family's gathering, consider how Baycrest has touched the life of someone you know and stay connected.

I encourage you to reach out and let me know your thoughts. Email me directly at gfoster@baycrest.org, visit our website, or find us on your favourite social media channel. I look forward to hearing from you.

One of the practical strategies McSorley uses from Baycrest research to offset his cognitive decline is getting plenty of rest before any drive of 30 minutes or longer – something he said has helped him tremendously in the last few years. He's also keen to become a Baycrest research subject in the near future.

"The NHL Alumni Association, through Baycrest, has an arrangement for alumni to get tested and checked up at the Centre. I haven't had the opportunity to do that yet, but I certainly will. I had friends and family members who suffered the effects of dementia. So it really strikes a chord. I want to see what they find, then do it again two or three years down the road to see if there's been any progress or regression cognitively with me," he notes. In the meantime, he says, it's imperative that people keep supporting Baycrest, whether through the Pro-Am or other channels, so the research and education about Alzheimer's and dementia can continue.

McSorley also has some final words of advice to those who think they might be suffering from memory loss unrelated to the normal aging process.

"To anybody who has suffered head injuries: go through the medical process of checking yourself out, so you can better understand and look for signs of dementia or cognitive impairment. There are things you can do to slow the process and keep yourself sharp.

And see you at the Pro-Am!"

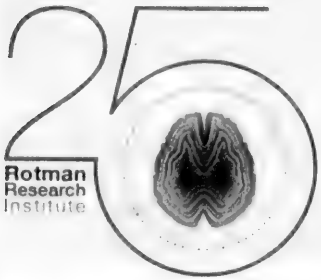
A quarter-century of discovery: Rotman Research Institute turns 25!

Back in 1989, Driving Miss Daisy was Best Picture, SkyDome opened in Toronto and the Berlin Wall came tumbling down in Europe.

At Baycrest, we were marking our own auspicious occasion – the inauguration of the Rotman Research Institute (RRI). In 2014, we are proudly celebrating 25 years as trailblazers in the area of brain research.



"There is a good case to be made that the RRI revolutionized research in cognitive neuroscience by assembling some of the greatest thinkers in cognitive theory and innovators in neuroscience methods to make the fundamental processes of our mind accessible to research," says Dr. Randy McIntosh Baycrest's Vice-President of Research and Director of the RRI. It's a "great honour and privilege" to lead the group, he says.

It has been a remarkable journey, and gratifying to those who work at the institute who have witnessed its rise to international stature in a relatively short period of time.

And it's in large part due to donors. By funding everything from research studies to staff, donations have enabled the RRI to attract and retain world-class scientists with innovative ideas.

The RRI boasts 26 scientists, including two prestigious Canada Research Chairs, and 29 postdoctoral fellows. More than 380 active research studies are underway, with more than 11,500 research study participants. It all bodes well for the future.

The Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied and Evaluative Research Unit at Baycrest supports translational research, leveraging the findings of RRI studies and caregiving practices to accelerate the development of our own programs and treatments. Dr. McIntosh is excited by the potential to help create new models of care that make use of RRI research.

"With the rapid development of mobile technologies, we can do work that takes the lab into the real-world to better appreciate the challenges someone with cognitive impairment faces and develop more effective customized solutions," he says.

Informed by a new research strategic plan, RRI is poised for another 25 years of growth and discovery to help clinicians address the brain health needs of people everywhere. www.baycrest.org/research25years/

Baycrest receives $1M from The Geoffrey H. Wood Foundation

The Mood and Related Disorders Clinic at Baycrest Health Sciences has received a second major gift of $1 million from The Geoffrey H. Wood Foundation. The first came in 2004, in the form of seed funding for the creation of the clinic.

This time, the money comes with a matching promise of $1 million from the Baycrest Foundation to enable the Mood and Related Disorders clinic to increase its reach to more vulnerable seniors across the province while also expanding research on the benefits of non-drug therapies like mindfulness-based stress reduction and problem-solving therapy in older populations.

Geoffrey H. Wood

It will also allow the clinic to increase the frequency of its telepsychiatry consultations and follow-ups to remote and underserviced areas of the province, and launch a new geriatric mental health website that provides educational resources to older adults and their caregivers.

"We are very grateful to the Wood Foundation for their generous support of this program. The new funding will allow us to serve more individuals suffering from mood disorders, utilizing a broad array of innovative interventions," says Dr. David Conn, Vice-President of Education at Baycrest.

In just under a decade, the Baycrest Mood and Related Disorders Clinic has established itself as one of Canada's leading models of care for older adults struggling with depression, stress, anxiety, chronic illness, pain and bereavement.

"We had a wonderful experience with Dr. Conn and his team in helping to establish the Clinic with our first gift. We kept in touch and thought we could now help to encourage new advances in treatment. We are pleased to be able to collaborate with Drs. Conn and Cindy Grief, Medical Director of the Clinic, in their exciting new endeavours," says John A. Broley, President of The Geoffrey H. Wood Foundation.

Celebrate Jewish Heritage Month with Baycrest

Looking for something a little off the beaten path for Jewish Heritage Month this year? Come see what's happening at Baycrest, where a world of Yiddishkheit awaits in May 2014. The following events and exhibitions are just a few of the things you can expect to experience starting in late April.

• April 29, 2014 – Opening ceremony storytelling and klezmer music in the Winter Garden.

• Ongoing – Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life featuring more than 180 photos of Holocaust survivors who are in Baycrest programs and/or residents.

• Ongoing - Origins of Judaic Symbols at the Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum.

• The Golden Age of Yiddish Theatre in Toronto, a collection of archival photographs, performance posters, and personal reflections.

• People of the Book - The Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles exhibits its art.

• My Yiddishe Momme: Artwork created by members of the Freeman Family Day Centre.

Baycrest on the Beach - 'Friendraising' in the sunshine state

In February, the Baycrest Foundation held its first-ever Baycrest on the Beach event. Graciously hosted by Gina & Paul Godfrey, Marya & Herman Grad, Honey & Barry Sherman, Fran & Ed Sonshine, Rochelle Reichert and Henry Wolfond, more than 100 guests – both old and new friends of Baycrest - gathered in Sunny Isles Beach, Florida. They shared powerful stories about their deep connections with Baycrest and learned more about how we are changing what it means to age. Baycrest President and CEO Dr. William Reichman entered into lively and poignant discussions with guests about how Baycrest is leading the way on subjects such as - how to spot the early onset of dementia, how to maintain a healthy brain and how Baycrest will help people to age well at home.

Khamenei posts Holocaust denial on Twitter

JTA

WASHINGTON — Jewish leaders condemned Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, for again questioning the Holocaust.

"#Holocaust is an event whose reality is uncertain and if it has happened, it's uncertain how it has happened" was posted March 21 to a Twitter account, @Khamenei.ir, believed to reflect Khamenei's policies.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei

"Once again, the injection of Holocaust denial by an Iranian leader shows the world how such deep-seated hatred exists at the helm in Iran," Abraham Foxman, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, said in a statement.

"We have seen the Ayatollah spew his vehement animosity toward Jews before on other national occasions in Iran, and these statements once again show the bigotry and hypocrisy of this regime," Foxman said.

Also condemning the remarks were the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the World Jewish Congress.

The recently elected Iranian president, Hassan Rouhani, and foreign minister, Javad Zarif, drew much attention late last year for acknowledging the Holocaust.

Rouhani has since qualified his remarks under pressure from hardliners in the Iranian regime, reflecting an Iranian policy – often expressed by Khamenei – of questioning whether the Holocaust occurred or if it is exaggerated.

Khamenei, like some other Iranian leaders, does not acknowledge or deny the veracity of social media accounts bearing his name, but the comment appeared to reflect the content of a speech he gave Friday for Nowruz, the Iranian New Year, which media reports said included an attack on some western nations for criminalizing Holocaust denial while criticizing Iran for controlling speech.

"Absolute #freedom doesn't exist anywhere in world. Even countries that claim 2 have freedom, set redlines on which they're utterly strict," the Twitter account in his name said. "Does anybody dare talk about #Holocaust in Europe? #freedom".

Hamas makes text threats

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli cellphone owners received text messages from Hamas threatening rocket attacks and kidnapping.

The four messages, sent on the 10th anniversary of Israel's assassination of Hamas leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin, were delivered last Saturday evening.

"A warning to Zionists. Kassam rockets are waiting with you. If you want the life then leave our country," said one message in Hebrew.

"Al-qassam has chosen you to be The next Shalite ... Be Ready," read another message, referring to former captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, who was kidnapped in 2006 by Hamas and freed five years later in a lopsided prisoner exchange.

The messages were also sent to government ministers and their spokespeople, as well as some journalists, according to Ynet. It was not possible to call back the numbers from which the messages were sent.

Abbas issues conditions for peace

JTA

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said the Palestinian leadership won't agree to a peace deal unless it includes a completely sovereign state with a capital in eastern Jerusalem.

Abbas reportedly made the statement March 22 during a meeting of his Fatah party's Central Committee.

In expressing its support for Abbas, the committee called for Israeli withdrawal – military and civilian – from the West Bank; rejected Israel's conditioning a peace agreement on recognition as a Jewish state; and for a resolution of the Palestinian refugee crisis based on United Nations resolution 194.

Russian sanctions could put Israel in World Cup

JTA

Israel would take part in the 2014 World Cup if the head of international soccer's governing body heeds the suggestion of two U.S. senators to sanction Russia over its Crimea actions.

In a letter earlier this month, Republican senators Mark Kirk of Illinois and Dan Coates of Indiana urged FIFA chair Sepp Blatter to suspend Russia from the World Cup in Brazil as punishment for its takeover of Crimea.

If Russia is banned from participation, its place would be assigned to Israel, which finished third in Group F at the 2014 FIFA World Cup qualification, trailing Russia and Portugal.

"In light of Russia's military occupation of a sovereign Ukraine, we respectfully ask that you urgently convene an emergency session of FIFA to consider suspending Russia's membership in FIFA, stripping Russia of the right to host the 2018 World Cup, and denying the Russian National Team the right to participate in the upcoming 2014 World Cup in Brazil," the senators' letter said.

Russia, the letter said, "does not deserve the honour of either hosting the World Cup or participating in one."

According to Article 3 of the FIFA statutes, the letter said, "discrimination of any kind against a country, private person or group of people on account of ethnic origin, gender, language, religion, politics or any other reason is strictly prohibited and punishable by suspension or expulsion."

On March 21, Blatter reiterated that Russia will host the 2018 World Cup, but did not comment on participation in the upcoming World Cup.

During the Balkan crisis, Yugoslavia was banned from playing in both the 1992 European Championship and the 1994 World Cup.

The United States and the European Union already have imposed economic sanctions against Russia following its occupation of Ukrainian military bases and other facilities.

Israeli actress says rabbinate refused to convert her

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli television celebrity said the Chief Rabbinate is refusing to convert her to Judaism because of her acting career.

Alin Levy, a 24-year-old reality TV celebrity whose Ukraine-born mother is Christian and whose father is Jewish, discussed her situation with Israel's Channel 10 in an interview that aired earlier this week.

She said she received a call from the rabbi handling her conversion informing her that dayanim, or rabbinical judges, decided to stop her conversion because they had learned details about her acting career and acting school, and decided they were incompatible with conversion.

Levy, who immigrated from Ukraine to Israel with her parents when she was four years old, was a participant in Israel's Big Brother reality TV show and is studying acting at the Yoram Levinstein acting school, according to Channel 10.

She said she had opened a file to undergo Orthodox conversion and told the rabbinate about her acting. The report did not say which office of the Chief Rabbinate handled her request and did not name the rabbis handling her case.

A spokesperson for the Religious Affairs Ministry told Channel 2 that conversion requires a fundamental change in an applicant's lifestyle. The response, as quoted by Channel 2, did not contain any specific reference to Levy's case.

PM lauds West Bank raid to nab terrorist

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised the security forces that took part in a deadly operation in the West Bank to arrest a Hamas terrorist.

The suspect and at least two others were killed in the raid in the Jenin refugee camp on Saturday morning.

"Our policy is to attack those who attack us and who are planning to attack us. Both were applicable in this case," Netanyahu said Sunday at the beginning of the weekly cabinet meeting.

Netanyahu commended the units in the raid for "carrying out a very important operation in eliminating someone who endangered Israeli citizens."

The suspected terrorist was identified as Hamza Abu Alhija, who was wanted for involvement in shooting and bombing attacks, as well as planning future terror attacks against Israeli civilians and Israeli soldiers, the Israel Defence Forces said in a statement.

Abu Alhija barricaded himself in his home with other Hamas operatives, according to the IDF, then opened fire on Israeli forces, wounding two, before attempting to escape while continuing to shoot. Israeli forces responded with live gunfire, killing him.

In the ensuing riot at the scene, Palestinians from Jenin threw rocks, firebombs and explosives at the Israeli forces. The Israelis responded with live fire, killing at least two other Palestinians, who were identified as belonging to Islamic Jihad and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, the military wing of the ruling Fatah party.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Three Palestinian terrorist groups – Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades – issued a joint statement warning that they will take revenge on Israel and the Palestinian Authority for the deaths.

"The resistance in the West Bank is alive and won't die, and the Zionist enemy can't guess from where the resistance will attack. The blood of Jenin martyrs won't go in vain," the groups said in a statement, according to the Times of Israel.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' office condemned the incident, calling it an "escalation" by Israel. The statement also called on the United States to get involved before the teetering peace negotiations are completely "ruined."

Baltimore Jews protest murderer's new trial bid

JTA

BALTIMORE — Some 200 Baltimore Jews attended a hearing to protest the possible release of a man who was convicted of murdering an 11-year-old Jewish girl in 1969.

Attorneys for Wayne Stephen Young, 68, are requesting a new trial based on a 2012 ruling by the Court of Appeals of Maryland, the state's highest court, which found that many convictions before 1980 are invalid because jurors were given unconstitutional instructions, the Baltimore Sun reported. Dozens of people convicted prior to 1980 have been set free due to the ruling.

Young was sentenced to life in prison for the murder of Esther Lebowitz and has been denied parole 12 times. He claimed during his trial that he was temporarily insane.

Esther was missing for two days before her body was found half a mile from her home. She died of 17 blows to the head.

"It would be a travesty of justice to allow a murderer that confessed to doing such horrible things to be freed," Frank Storch, a co-founder of the Northwest Citizens Patrol, told the Sun.

Storch organized buses to shuttle the Baltimore Jewish community members to the courthouse for the March 20 hearing. He said he was 12 when Esther was killed and recalls well the search for her, the Sun reported.

Her family, which has since moved to Israel, did not attend the hearing, though they reportedly were aware of it.

Baltimore Circuit Judge Edward Hargadon said he would issue a written opinion in the coming weeks. Young did not speak at the hearing.

Tzimmes for the holidays

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

I actually didn't grow up with tzimmes. I'm not sure why. My mother quite likes it although her mother, my grandmother, made it by coarsely mashing carrots, which she served with cooked tiny matzah balls, which my mother recalls as being quite savoury as opposed to sweet.

It wasn't until I got married, many, many moons ago, and we went to my sister-in-law's for Passover, that I truly got acquainted with tzimmes. Since then I have realized that there are as many tzimmes variations out there as there are cooks.

As I've written before, I'm partial to sweet things, especially when meat is involved, so tzimmes speaks to my heart. The combination of spices such as cinnamon and ground ginger, paired with sweet potatoes, carrots and prunes, is a luscious unification, one that compliments almost any main dish of lamb, chicken or brisket. For those of you who, like me, had never made your own tzimmes growing up, I have included a classic version, made with only vegetables. It can easily be made ahead and reheated. The beef tzimmes is what you might call a fine stew, best made with flanken or short ribs, but equally delicious made with stewing beef.

CLASSIC TZIMMES

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, chopped
5 large carrots, peeled and sliced
1 tsp. cinnamon
3/4 tsp. salt
4 sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into 1-in. chunks
1 cup dried apricots
2 tsp. grated orange zest
2/3 cup fresh orange juice
1/4 cup honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 1/2 cups pitted prunes

Preheat the oven to 350. Lightly spray a 13x9-in. glass baking dish; set aside.

In a large saucepan, heat the oil over medium heat. Add the onion, cook, stirring, for 3 minutes. Add the carrots; cook, stirring, for 5 minutes. Stir in the cinnamon and salt until the carrots are well coated. Transfer to the prepared pan. Stir in the sweet potatoes, apricots, orange zest and juice, honey and lemon juice.

Cover with foil; cook in the centre of the preheated oven for 30 minutes. Stir in the prunes. Cover again and cook for 30 to 40 minutes or until vegetables are very tender and well glazed. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

BEEF, CARROT AND SWEET POTATO TZIMMES

3 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 lb. flanken or 2-1/2 lb stewing beef
2 onions, finely chopped
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. salt
3/4 tsp. ground ginger
1/2 tsp. pepper
pinch freshly ground nutmeg
3 cups beef stock
1/2 cup kosher for Passover red wine
2 tbsp. honey
4 sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into chunks
3 carrots, peeled and thickly sliced
1 cup pitted prunes

Heat 2 tbsp. of the oil in a large Dutch oven. In batches if necessary, brown the flanken on both sides. Transfer to a plate; keep warm.

Add the remaining oil to pan. Reduce the heat to medium. Add the onions; cook, stirring, for about 5 minutes or until softened. Stir in cinnamon, salt, ginger, pepper and nutmeg until the onions are well coated. Return meat to the pan. Pour in the stock, wine and honey. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for 1 hour.

Add the sweet potatoes, carrots and prunes to the pan. Cover and cook for 1 to 1-1/2 hours or until the meat is falling off the bones and the vegetables are fork tender. Makes 8 servings.

Enjoy a gluten-free seder

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

The following two recipes come from Gluten-Free Goes Gourmet by Vicki Pearl of Brooklyn, N.Y. Her new kosher cookbook contains 100 gluten-free, dairy-free, corn-free recipes that she has made many times for family and friends, and they are now being made by her clients and friends. Vicki has been involved for many years in helping families who have members with gluten sensitivity.

Gluten-Free Goes Gourmet contains recipes that use wholesome and natural ingredients, relying mainly on fresh poultry or meat and plenty of fresh vegetables and fruit, rather than foods that have ingredients that you can't even pronounce! This is not a Passover cookbook, but the recipes below are perfect for Passover or all year round.

VICKI PEARL'S TWO TONE VEGETABLE KUGEL

It's this simple to serve a nutritious gourmet side dish. The orange of the sweet potato layer contrasts beautifully with the deep green of the broccoli layer.

2 large sweet potatoes
1 1/2 lb. frozen broccoli florets
2 large eggs
2–3 heaping tbsp. mayonnaise, divided
2 tbsp. potato starch, divided
2 tsp. kosher salt, divided
1/8 tsp. garlic powder
1/8 tsp. onion powder

Preheat oven to 350. Grease or line a 9-inch round or square baking pan or dish.

Peel and cut sweet potato into large chunks. Place chunks in a large pot filled with water set over high heat. Bring to boil. Add a pinch of salt. Reduce heat; simmer, covered, for 20 minutes or until potatoes are soft. Drain potatoes; return to pot and mash with a potato masher. Stir in 1 of the eggs, 1 tbsp of the mayonnaise, 1 tbsp. of the potato starch, and half of the salt, mixing well.

In a separate large pot, bring water to a rolling boil. Add a pinch of salt. Add broccoli and cook over high heat, uncovered, for 10 minutes.

Drain broccoli; return to the pot and mash with a potato masher. Stir in remaining egg, 1 to 2 heaping tablespoons of mayonnaise, remaining potato starch and salt, and garlic and onion powders, mixing well.

Spoon broccoli mixture evenly into bottom of prepared pan, smoothing surface. Top with sweet potato mixture, spreading evenly.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 1 hour or until the top is golden. Yield: 6 to 8 servings. Freezes well for up to 3 months

Note: To create a third tier, boil 1 1/2 lb. of chopped cauliflower (fresh or frozen) in lightly salted boiling water. Mash and add 1 egg, 1 heaping tbsp. mayonnaise, a pinch of salt, and onion and garlic powders. Spread on top of broccoli layer. Bake as directed.

Vicki shared the following recipe as a response to parents coming to her, anxious to get their children to consume more protein. Some children flat out didn't like chicken, for some it was an issue of texture, and for others, chicken bones were off-putting. She chose to go with cutlets for the latter reason, eliminating the need to deal with bones. White meat has less texture than dark meat, eliminating that problem as well. Potato chips, as everyone knows, tend to be a favourite among young diners, so in they went, as did a mild but pleasing mayonnaise-based marinade. The combination was successful, and some parents, once their kids tasted this recipe, have even gone on to add this coating to bone-in chicken.

VICKI PEARL'S CRISPY CHICKEN ON SKEWERS

Yum! Yum! Crushed potato chips and a touch of sweetness, all wrapped up in one package. Kids love this one.

2 lb. chicken cutlets (6 large slices), pounded thin and cut into 2-inch strips
1 bag (8 oz.) kettle-cooked potato chips

Marinade:
3/4 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. honey
2 tsp. kosher salt
1 tsp. garlic powder
1/2 tsp. paprika
12–15 12-inch skewers

Preheat oven to 350. Place skewers in a baking pan filled with cold water to prevent them from splintering.

In a small bowl, stir together mayonnaise, honey, salt, garlic powder, and paprika.

Crush potato chips either by adding to the bowl of a food processor and pulsing several times until crushed or by placing in a Ziploc bag, squeezing the air out, and rolling a rolling pin over bag. Place crushed chips on a piece of parchment paper.

Dip chicken strips into marinade, coating well.

Remove skewers from water; pat dry. Thread one to two chicken strips onto each skewer. Lightly roll chicken skewers in chips, coating well. Suspend skewers along the edges of a 9x13-inch baking pan.

Bake in centre of oven for 40 minutes. Yield: 6 to 8 servings.

Passover and diabetes

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Holidays are an integral part of Jewish life. And a huge part of observing holidays, especially Passover, is sharing holiday meals with friends and family. Sticking with a healthy lifestyle during Passover can be difficult for many people, but for those with diabetes, a chronic disease that affects nine million Canadians, it can be especially challenging.

So how do you manage your diabetes during Passover without forfeiting the benefits of a healthy lifestyle? For starters, make sure to continue eating regular meals, never going more than about six hours without eating. This is especially important on the seder nights. If you're hungry before the Haggadah is read, you'll be starving by the time the meal is served. This can result in overeating and will make it difficult to keep your blood sugars in control. Instead, have a snack in the late afternoon before the seder begins.

When filling your plate, think about what a balanced meal looks like. Ideally, you want half your plate to be filled with vegetables, while the remaining half is split equally between healthy proteins and whole grains. This balance will help to keep your blood sugars stable. And don't forget to pay attention to all the extra bites and small handfuls of food you taste. It's easy to ignore the small second helpings you have but these extra foods can add up.

Perhaps more important than what you eat during the seder meals is what you eat during the rest of the holiday. Many people seem to think that Passover is an excuse to indulge in heavy meal after heavy meal, but by cooking with fresh, wholesome ingredients and focusing mostly on vegetables, small amounts of chicken or fish, and whole grains like quinoa, managing your diabetes during Passover is easy. Surprisingly, eating healthy foods on Passover can actually be both simple and delicious and can even be done using foods that you already eat throughout the rest of the year.

Finally, don't forget to stay active. Physical activity improves your body's use of insulin which helps lower your blood sugars. Adding 30 minutes of activity each day during Passover will help you stay healthy throughout the holidays.

New Passover recipes promise culinary flair

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Every now and then there is a new recipe book that combines easy-to-make dishes with tantalizing photographs.

A Taste of Pesach, a project of Yeshiva Me'on Hatorah (Roosevelt, N.J.), is one such book, a hardcover recipe book that promises to reinvent your Passover menu and inspire you with creative culinary twists and turns during this hungry time of year.

Many schools and communities have tried the same technique of compiling a recipe book to sell as a fundraiser, and that's how this one had its genesis seven years ago. But while most of those fundraiser books have a short lifespan before they're recycled or mislaid, A Taste of Pesach is unlikely to follow the same trajectory. For one, it's a gorgeous book you can't wait to page through, and one you'd be proud to hand over as a gift to a newlywed daughter or close friend. For another, it's chock full of irresistible culinary eye candy, with recipes that are for the most part easy, and call on ingredients that are readily available. Look through the book and you find yourself murmuring, "hmmm… I can do this."

The mothers who volunteered the 150+ recipes for A Taste of Pesach are a diverse group, but they all want the same things at the end of the day, write the editors in their introduction.

"[We want] food that will get rave reviews, [is] user-friendly, [has] visually attractive recipes with accurate cooking times, has yields and recipes that have broad appeal and that works. We're just like you," they write.

Most of those recipes don't require a huge spirit of adventure in the kitchen, but rather, call for a minor stretch in their use of different ingredients than you might typically incorporate. The sweet potato crisps salad, for example, is a lettuce-based green salad to which strips of fried sweet potato are added as a garnish just prior to serving. The image of this dish is so tempting, it makes you want to reach in and steal a piece of crisp off the topping. This is true for the majority of the recipes, each one prefaced with a photograph, and categorized by chapter into appies, soups, salads, fish, poultry, meat, sides, dessert, cake and cookies and gebrokts.

The recipes are accompanied by handy tips on how to make their preparation easier and faster, or how to plate it most attractively. There are traditional old favourites like gefilte fish, chremslach and kugels, and more modern twists or reinvented dishes like unstuffed cabbage, pastrami and spinach stuffed chicken, and cashew butter muffins.

Extra eye candy is offered in the chapter headers, which display images of seder plates reflecting different times, styles and tastes. Passover is not a time of year that usually excites Jewish taste buds, but A Taste of Pesach promises to add flair, creativity and innovation on your table – without even stretching your culinary skills to their limits.

Gluten-free recipes are a real treat

Cookbook author and pastry chef, Paula Shoyer, author of The Holiday Kosher Baker (Sterling), offers a thoroughly modern approach to Jewish holiday baking that includes both contemporary and traditional recipes, more than 45 of which have been skillfully tailored for Passover. Recipes for low-sugar, gluten-free, vegan and nut-free treats are also included. Shoyer is currently hard at work on her next cookbook, tentatively called The New Passover Menu, with food and decadent desserts, to be published for Passover 2015.

PAULA SHOYER'S PISTACHIO COOKIES

Paula writes: "Paula Jacobson, who graciously shared this recipe with me, is a professional recipe tester and editor. I always smile when I think of her, because at every event she wears a spectacular hat that rivals any royal head covering. Baking does not get much simpler than a cookie with 4 ingredients, and these cookies have the perfect combination of crunch and chew."

3 cups shelled, unsalted pistachio nuts (about 1 1/2 lb. nuts in their shells)
3 large egg whites
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. confectioner's sugar to dust cookies

Preheat oven to 325. Place the pistachio nuts into the bowl of a food processor fitted with a metal blade. Process until the nuts are finely ground.

In a separate bowl, use a whisk to mix together the egg whites and sugar. Add the ground nuts and mix until combined. Place in the fridge for at least 20 minutes.

Cover two cookie sheets with parchment paper. Scoop up a little less than 1 tablespoon of dough at a time and roll into balls. Place on the cookie sheets one inch apart.

Bake for 16 to 18 minutes, or until lightly browned. It's okay if the cookies are still a bit soft when you remove them from the oven because they will harden while cooling.

Slide the parchment onto a wire rack. When the cookies are cool, use a sieve to dust them with confectioner's sugar. Store covered at room temperature for up to four days or freeze for up to three months. Makes 40.

PAULA'S CARROT CAKE

This is another easy cake that is great as a snack or fancy enough to serve to guests. When Paula made her first version of a Passover carrot cake, she was disappointed that the grated carrot strands separated from the batter. She did some research to see how to fix the problem and learned that Shirley Corriher, author of the fabulous baking bible, Bakewise, recommends using finely chopped carrots instead of the grated strands. The result is a cake speckled with bright orange dots throughout.

Vegetable oil and 1 tbsp. gluten-free cake meal or potato starch for greasing pan
6 large eggs, separated
1 1/4 cups sugar, divided
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 cups almond flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 cup gluten-free cake meal or potato starch
2 cups chopped carrots (use a food processor with the metal blade until you have tiny pieces), about 4 large carrots
Confectioner's sugar for dusting, if desired

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a Bundt pan with the vegetable oil, and then sprinkle it with the tablespoon of gluten-free cake meal or potato starch. Shake the pan to coat it evenly and tap out excess.

Put the egg yolks, 1 cup of the sugar, and the cinnamon into a medium or large bowl and beat for one minute with an electric mixer on medium speed. Add the almond flour, baking powder and gluten-free cake meal or potato starch and mix well. Add the chopped carrots and mix to distribute.

In a separate bowl, beat the egg whites on high speed until soft peaks form. Reduce the speed to low and add the remaining 1/4 cup sugar a little at a time, and then turn the speed back to high and beat another minute. Use a silicone spatula to fold the whites into the batter in 4 to 5 parts, mixing increasingly more slowly with each addition.

Pour the batter into the prepared Bundt pan and bake for 50 minutes, or until a skewer inserted comes out clean and the top is golden.

Let the cake cool for one hour and then turn it out onto a wire rack to cool completely.

Dust with confectioner's sugar. Store covered at room temperature for up to four days or freeze for up to three months. Serves 12 to 15

Cozy one-dish wonders for Passover

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

No one can say when one-dish meals were invented, but they have been around for quite some time. Pottage made from locally gathered vegetables and herbs as well as meat from hunted wild animals was likely the first one-pot meal. Most cultures can boast their own version of the one-pot meal.

The Jews are well known for cholent, a traditionally slow cooked Sabbath stew, the French are known for pot-au-feu, a French stew of oxtail, marrow and vegetables, and the Italians are famous for minestrone, a complete meal in a pot.

One-dish meals are often the cozy and familiar comfort food we look forward to. They offer a convenient method of making meals without a lot of bother. Not everyone has the luxury of being able to prepare three different dishes, a protein, a vegetable and a starch, to provide a perfectly balanced meal every evening. This especially difficult during Passover.

One-dish meals have many other benefits. They offer quick prep times, often involving simple ingredients. You usually need to use only one energy source, significantly saving on energy costs. One dirty pot uses less detergent and water during clean up, not to mention the pleasure of only having to clean only that one pot.

Additionally these recipes can often be doubled and a portion frozen for another day, a double savings on all counts. Many one-pot meals can be altered to please fussy eaters by exchanging ingredients. Furthermore, in many recipes, you can leave out the meat and add more vegetables and/or potatoes for a tasty vegetarian option. If you are looking for a manageable option for a weeknight Passover dinner look no further than one-pot meals. Make one of these three interesting new meals for a fresh and appealing change for everyone at your table this Passover.

BEEF STEW SOUP WITH DUMPLINGS

Is it a stew, or is it a soup? Whatever the answer, make this one-pot wonder in the largest pot you can find. This marvellous meal won't stay around for long.

Soup
1 1/2 lb. stewing beef, fat removed cut into bite sized pieces
4 tbsp. potato starch
3 tbsp. vegetable oil plus 1 tablespoon vegetable oil
3 large cloves garlic, sliced
6 stocks celery, sliced into 1/4-in. pieces
3 zucchinis, cut into bite sized pieces
4 large carrots, sliced into 1/4-in. pieces
2 red peppers, cut into bite sized pieces
2 yellow peppers cut into bite sized pieces
4 cups beef or chicken stock
1 1/2 cups red wine
2 tbsp. fresh rosemary, chopped finely
1 tbsp. dried chives
2 tsp. salt or to taste
1/2 tsp. pepper or to taste
12 oz. white mushrooms sliced

Dumplings
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 eggs, beaten
1 cup matzah meal
1/2 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. pepper
1 tbsp. dried chives
1/2 cup soda water

Mix dumpling ingredients together well, cover and refrigerate until needed.

Heat 3 tbsp. of oil in a large, heavy bottomed pot. Coat beef in potato starch and, in two or three batches, brown in hot oil. Remove browned beef to a bowl.

Add 1 tbsp. oil to pot, and sauté garlic until soft. Pour wine into pot and, with a spoon, scrape up any crumbs stuck to the bottom of the pot. Return beef to the pot and add the remaining soup ingredients, except mushrooms, to the pot.

Cover ingredients with water to reach 5 to 6 inches above the ingredients. Bring to a rolling boil and reduce heat to medium low. Simmer covered over medium low heat for 1-1/2 hours, or until beef is tender. Stir occasionally. Add additional water if necessary. After soup has cooked for 1-1/2 hours, take dumpling mixture from fridge and, with oiled hands, or using medical style gloves, make small balls, about the size of a gumball, and drop them one at a time into the soup. Add mushrooms and increase heat to medium high for 25 minutes more. Taste for seasonings, add more salt and pepper if needed. Freezes well.

ONE-PAN LEMON CHICKEN AND POTATOES

8 boneless/skinless chicken breasts
6 skinless chicken legs, thigh attached
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
zest of 4 lemons
2/3 cup fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. sugar
10 garlic cloves, finely diced
4 tbsp. kosher salt
1 tsp. freshly ground pepper
1 can of cucumbers in brine, drained and rinsed
3 lemons, sliced with seeds removed
2 lb. fingerling potatoes

Comfort food for dinner

Preheat oven to 450. Place tinfoil in the bottom of a large lasagna-style baking pan. Use the vegetable oil to grease the bottom of the pan. Mix together lemon zest, fresh lemon juice, sugar and garlic. Wash the potatoes and cut them in half lengthwise. Place face up in the bottom of the pan.

Mix together the salt and pepper and sprinkle about 1/2 over the potatoes. Place the chicken over the potatoes and sprinkle the remaining salt and pepper mixture over the chicken. Take 4 large pickles and dice them up. Sprinkle them over the chicken and pour the lemon mixture over the chicken. Finally place the lemon slices over the chicken.

Cover the pan with foil and bake for 1 hour. Remove the foil and continue to bake for 15 minutes to brown the chicken. Serve the chicken and potatoes with the lemon sauce from the pan. Garnish with remaining pickles and baked lemon slices.

DECONSTRUCTED CABBAGE ROLLS

1 large cabbage, cored and cut into bite sized pieces
2 lb. lean ground beef
1 small onion, finely chopped
2 cups celery, finely chopped
1 cup green pepper, finely chopped
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 cup matzah meal
1 egg, beaten
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. fresh garlic, minced
1 cup raisins

Sauce
1/2 cup vinegar
1 can tomato puree, 28 oz.
2 cans, diced tomatoes, 28 oz.
2/3 cup brown sugar, packed
salt and pepper to taste

In a bowl combine beef, matzah meal, egg, salt, pepper, garlic and raisins.

In a large Dutch oven or heavy bottomed stock pot, heat oil and sauté the onion, celery and green pepper until soft. Remove pot from the heat and add sautéed vegetables to the beef mixture and combine. Add 1 cup of water to the bottom of the pot. Put the cabbage in the pot.

Add the sauce ingredients to the pot and add the cabbage. Put pot back on the stove at a high heat. Make meatballs, about the size of ping pong balls and add them one at a time to the sauce and cabbage. Bring mixture to a boil and then reduce heat to medium. Do not stir until the meatballs have been cooking for a while and have toughened up a bit. Put lid onto pot.

Occasionally gently stir up the cabbage from the bottom of the pot to the top while distributing the meatballs evenly throughout the pot. Reduce the heat to simmer and continue cooking, covered, for a total cooking time of 2-1/2 hours.

The secrets of mother's chicken soup

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

Ever wonder why, when dinner is ready, whether the meal includes soup or not, the cook exclaims, "Soup's on"?

Soup – a course as metaphor. Nourishment and comfort in a bowl.

Our language is replete with soup idioms. A facility to feed the hungry and poor is a soup kitchen. A revved up car is "souped up." If it has it all, it's "got everything from soup to nuts." A real cinch is "easy as duck soup." And when you're in the thick of it, you're "in the soup."

Soup is mysterious, deep and alluring – think witch's brew and blinding fog – the giver of life from whence we come, the prehistoric primordial soup. And don't even get me started on the whole Chicken Soup for the Soul series.

Say the word "soup" and instantly that tummy warmer from childhood comes to mind. The steaming bowl of tomato soup my mother fed me when I was sick. Holiday dinners with Aunt Irene's matzah balls and my mother's incredible chicken soup.

And incredible it is. Shortly after my cookbook was published, I found this message on my answering machine from my friend Diane Weiss in New Jersey: "Judy? I just made your mother's chicken soup, and my whole family is standing around the pot slurping with a straw!"

I know. I know. You think your mother's chicken soup is the best. Well, it's not. My mother's is the best, and here's why. You see, my mother adhered to the "if some is good, more is better" school of cooking. While this theory sometimes spells disaster, for chicken soup it is the method of choice. And this is one case where the method is as important as the ingredients. Here are my mother's tips for perfect results:

1. Even if you're not kosher, you must use kosher chickens. The jury is still out on why they taste so much better. Is it the method of killing? The freshness? The salting? The blessing? Who knows, but there really is a difference. (Note: Kosher chickens are salted, so watch that shaker!)

2. Pack it in! Oh, how my mother used to laugh when she saw chicken soup recipes from famous cookbook authors calling for a stalk of celery and two carrots. She used two pounds of carrots. In fact, she put the whole produce market in that soup, her deep golden brew, intensely flavourful, in short, an elixir of the gods. I hoard the leftovers to use instead of chicken stock (the real secret of my stuffing and gravy). Pack those vegetables into your pot, or conversely, use as little water as possible to produce the most intense flavour. Resist the temptation to get a little more soup by adding a little more water.

3. You must use fresh dill, and lots of it.

4. After cooking, reserve some carrots to be sliced into the soup later. Then squeeze the remaining vegetables well through a strainer for extra flavour. (Not like that. I mean really hard.)

I serve it with my Shiitake Mushroom Matzah Balls, but this year I'm adding homemade lokshen from Tamar Ansh's new cookbook, Pesach – Anything's Possible (Targum Press), which adds the requisite nostalgia factor. How well I remember my grandma making her own soup noodles very much like these.

This is Ansh's second Passover cookbook (A Taste of Tradition: Pesach and Beyond was the first), and she is also the author of the authoritative and well-received A Taste of Challah, both published by Feldheim. With Pesach – Anything's Possible, she brings her expected flair and creativity to Passover cooking with 350 wheat-free, gluten-free, and non-gebrochts recipes. "Gebrochts is where matzah in any form, even fully baked matzah or matzah meal, could potentially come into contact with water or other liquids," explains Rebbetzin Sarah Meisels in the foreword. "The communities who follow this minhag [custom] do not eat this on the first seven days of Pesach."

With dietary guidelines, special family customs and endless meals to prepare, cooking for Passover is often a daunting chore. Ansh's recipes, ranging from basic to gourmet, will resolve those dilemmas: Salmon Gefilte Fish, Pomegranate Chicken, Dairy Delights to serve all week like Eggplant Parmesan and Banana-Sweet Potato Soufflé, 34 kugels alone, including Tri-Layered Vegetable Kugel, Sweet Potato-to-Apple Tsimmes Kugel and Rebbetizin Meisel's Apple Blintz Kugel, and a tempting assortment of luscious desserts, including a rolled Chocolate Mousse Cake and Strawberry Shortcake. According to Ansh, with Passover, "anything is possible."

LILLIAN BART'S BEST CHICKEN SOUP

While her exact ingredients would vary as the mood hit her, here is her recipe from a typical day.

2 chickens (3 1/2 to 4 lb. each) with giblets (no liver), quartered
2 pounds carrots (yes, 2 lb., not 2 carrots)
2 large onions, cut in half
5 large ribs celery with leaves, cut in half
2 large parsnips
1 small sweet potato (6 oz.), cut in half
1 turnip (6 oz.), cut in half
1 rutabaga (6 oz.), cut in half
1 small celery root, cut in half (optional)
1/2 large green bell pepper, stemmed and seeded
1/2 large yellow pepper, stemmed and seeded
2 large bunches dill, coarsely chopped (about 1½ cups)
1/2 bunch curly-leaf parsley (about ¼ cup)
3 cloves garlic
kosher (coarse) salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste chopped dill, for serving (optional)

Place chicken in 16-quart stockpot and add water to barely cover. Bring just to boiling point. Reduce heat to simmer and skim off foam on top. Add remaining ingredients (except the optional chopped dill) and only enough water to come within about two thirds of height of chicken and vegetables in pot. Most recipes tell you to add water to cover. Do not do this! You want elixir of the gods or weak tea? As soup cooks, vegetables will shrink and will be covered soon enough. Simmer, covered, until chicken is cooked through, about 1-1/2 hours.

Remove chicken and about half the carrots, and set aside.

Mushroom matzah balls go well with soup

Strain soup through a fine-mesh strainer into another pot or container, pressing on the vegetables to extract all the flavour. Scrape the underside of the strainer with a rubber spatula and add pulp to soup. Discard fibrous vegetable membranes that remain in strainer. If you're fussy about clarity (and we're not), strain again through fine tea strainer, but there goes some of the flavour. (See Note.) Cover the soup and refrigerate overnight.

When ready to serve, scoop congealed fat off surface and discard. Reheat, adding more dill if desired (and we do). Slice reserved carrots, add to soup, and serve. Take bows. Yield: About 3 quarts

Note: Wait! This just in! Last time I made the soup, I took all the itty-bitty vegetable particles from the second straining and put them in the blender with a little soup. This lighter mixture when mixed with the whole pot of soup isn't really noticeable, but the flavour… oh, my!

SHIITAKE MUSHROOM MATZAH BALLS

I doctored up plain old matzah ball mix – and a fine product it is! – with shiitake mushrooms and scallions for a shtetl favourite with an Asian twist. (Not surprising. Jews have had a long love affair with Chinese food!) Go ahead and double or even triple the recipe (and you may have to), but be careful not to crowd the pot when you are cooking them.

1/4 cup melted chicken fat or vegetable oil
4 scallions, white and half the green part, thinly sliced
3 oz. shiitake mushrooms, stems discarded, finely chopped (1 to 1½ cups)
1 envelope matzah ball mix, such as Manischewitz
1/2 cup matzah meal
4 large eggs, lightly beaten
2 tbsp. finely chopped flat-leaf parsley
1 tsp. kosher (coarse) salt
1/8 tsp. white pepper
1 tsp. baking powder (see Notes)
2 tbsp. club soda, chicken broth, or water

Heat the chicken fat in a medium-size saucepan over medium heat. Add the scallions and mushrooms and cook, stirring often, until the mushrooms are soft, about 5 minutes. Set aside.

Combine the matzah ball mix with the matzah meal in a medium-size bowl. Add the eggs and mix well. Stir in the mushroom mixture (with the oil), parsley, salt, white pepper and baking powder. Add the club soda and mix thoroughly. Cover and refrigerate until firm, at least 1 hour.

Bring a large pot of water to a boil and lightly salt it.

Form the mixture into balls that are a little larger than a marble, wetting your hands if necessary to keep them from sticking. Drop the balls into the boiling water and cook, covered, at a slow, steady boil (not a hard boil) until tender, about 30 minutes (depending on the size of the balls).

Carefully remove the matzah balls with a slotted spoon, and serve in soup.

Notes: For Passover use kosher-for-Passover baking powder, or if unavailable, it may be omitted.

You will find that after cooking these matzah balls, the cooking liquid is so flavourful, it is almost a soup in itself, particularly if you have used chicken fat. I use this broth instead of water in soups and stews and for cooking rice.

Makes 24 to 30 golf-ball-size balls

Source: Cooking Jewish

4 eggs
1/4 cup potato starch
1/3 cup water

Beat all ingredients together until as smooth as possible. Refrigerate a few hours. Remove any bubbles from top of mixture before frying.

Heat some oil in a frying pan, or use nonstick pan, over medium-high heat. When oil is hot, pour in some batter, and rotate pan, spreading batter evenly around pan. Fry about a minute. As blintz begins to curl, flip it out onto plate. Continue making blintz leaves with remaining batter.

Roll up the pile of egg blintzes and cut into thin strips. Serve in hot soup.

Serves 8-10.

Let the kids help cook for the holiday

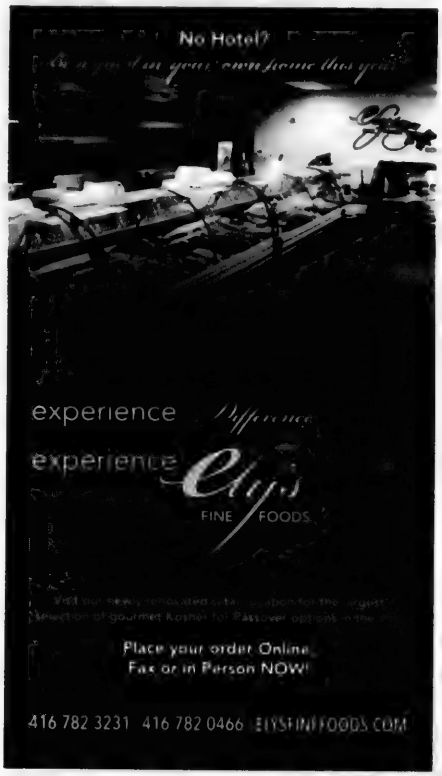
Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Israeli cookbook author Tamar Ansh is a busy mom who loves to write, cook, bake, read and chat with her kids. Since her kids have recently taken over the kitchen, Tamar decided to share what they do with her readers. Her latest cookbook is cleverly titled Let My Children Cook! A Passover Cookbook for Kids. Ansh makes it easy for kids to share in the fun of cooking – at a time of year when parents can really use a little help. Kids will also discover how to cook delicious food on their own.

Let My Children Cook! contains over 80 delicious and easy Passover recipes with step-by-step instructions, and is geared to kids age eight and up.

There are many creative menu and presentation ideas specifically for young kids. Each recipe comes with an icon that indicates whether the food is meat, dairy or pareve. Colourful illustrations appear throughout the book, many of which teach important lessons, such as washing your hands before cooking, cleaning up when finished – and "put your pot of cooking food on the back burner and turn the pot handles toward the back."

The author has also included an arts and crafts section with four fun projects, including making Passover aprons and placemats for the seders.



CHEESY MATZAH PIE

6-7 squares matzahs
5 eggs
1 cup milk
2 cups cottage cheese
1/3 cup sugar
3/4 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. butter, melted
1 tsp. cinnamon

Beat the eggs and milk together in a bowl. Add the cottage cheese, sugar, salt and melted butter. Mix again.

Grease a 2-quart casserole or baking dish. Preheat the oven to 350.

Break the matzahs into medium-sized pieces. Arrange part of them in one flat layer on the bottom of the baking dish.

Pour some of the cottage cheese mixture over the matzah. Place the rest of the matzah pieces on top and then pour the rest of the cottage cheese mix over the matzah. Depending on the size of your baking dish, you may have enough matzah pieces and cheese mix for either two or three layers. The top layer should be the cheese mixture.

Sprinkle cinnamon all over the top of the "pie."

Slide your matzah pie into the hot oven and let it bake for 35-40 minutes, until it is set. Serve as is, or topped with sliced peaches or your favourite jam.

ROCKY ROAD BROWNIES

4 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, chopped
1 cup margarine or 1 cup oil
1 1/2 cups sugar
4 eggs
1 cup matzah cake meal
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup chocolate chips
2 cups mini marshmallows
1 cup walnuts, chopped
Topping:
1 cup mini marshmallows
1/2 cup chocolate chips
1/2 cup walnuts, coarsely ground

Preheat the oven to 325. Prepare a 9x13-in. pan by lining it with parchment paper or spraying it well with cooking oil spray.

Melt the chopped chocolate and margarine in a double boiler and stir well. Stir in the sugar. Cool slightly.

Whisk in the eggs one at a time. Stir in the cake meal and salt, and remove the pot from the heat. Stir in the chocolate chips, marshmallows and walnuts.

Pour this batter into the prepared baking pan and bake for 30 minutes or until set. Remove the pan from the oven and sprinkle the brownies with the additional cup of marshmallows.

Slide the tray back into the oven and bake 3-4 minutes more, until the marshmallows are puffed. Remove the pan from the oven and melt the second set of chocolate chips. Drizzle the melted chips all over the brownies and then sprinkle them, while the chocolate is still wet, with the last bit of ground nuts. Cut into squares and serve.

CRUNCHY CHICKEN CRISPS

Tamar Ansh's kids have friends who make chicken like this and have been asking me for ages to do it with them too. What a treat!

4 chicken legs, each cut in half so you have 4 drumsticks and 4 thighs
1/2 cup matzah meal or potato starch
1 tbsp. garlic powder
1 tbsp. onion powder
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1 tbsp. paprika
1 tsp. parsley flakes
1 large bag potato chips
4 eggs
cooking oil spray

And here's how you do it!

Wash off the chicken legs and take the skin off each one. Pat them dry and place them on a plate. Preheat the oven to 375.

Place the matzah meal (or potato starch) and all the spices into a bowl. Mix together with a fork.

Put all the eggs into another bowl, and beat them lightly with a fork.

In another bowl, crush the potato chips into very small pieces.

Spray a large baking pan with cooking oil spray. Dip each chicken piece into the matzah meal mix with the spices, then the egg, and then the potato chips. Lay it down in the pan and continue until all the chicken pieces have been double-coated.

Any matzah meal crumbs and/or potato chip crumbs that are left over must be thrown out. They had raw chicken dipped into them and cannot be eaten! Don't lick your fingers after dipping them into the potato chip crumbs. Wash your hands off really well after handling raw chicken.

Spray the chicken pieces with the cooking oil spray to coat. Slide the pan into the oven and bake for 50-60 minutes until the chicken is fork-tender. Do not overbake.

If you want to kick things up a bit, you can add 1 tsp. cayenne pepper into the spice and matzah meal mix.

Copyright infringement alleged over book

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A documentary film producer and two of her colleagues are suing a Toronto investment manager and her publisher for copyright infringement over a book they say incorporates large swathes of material from their film.

Judy Maltz, Lisa Bird and Richie Sherman are asking for $3 million in damages from Jenny Witterick, who wrote the award-winning book My Mother's Secret, as well as from Penguin Books Canada. The filmmakers say the book lifts entire passages from their 2009 documentary, No. 4 Street of Our Lady.

"I've done nothing wrong and will be defending this case," said Witterick, founder and CEO of Sky Investment Counsel, a Toronto investment firm with approximately $1.8 billion in assets.

The film is based on a true story involving Maltz's grandparents, her father, and other members of their family who were hidden from the Nazis during World War II in a Polish woman's barn.

According to legal documents filed in Federal Court, "The [film] is a documentary based upon the true story of Franciszka Halamajowa, a Polish-Catholic woman who rescued 15 of her Jewish neighbors during the Holocaust in the small town of Sokal, then in eastern Poland and now in Ukraine, while cleverly passing herself off as a Nazi sympathizer.

"Amongst those saved by Halamajowa were Maltz's grandparents and father, two aunts and an uncle. Prior to the release of the [documentary film], this story was virtually unknown, recorded only in the posthumously published diary of the late Moshe Maltz who was one of those rescued by Halamajowa," the court documents say.

According to the court documents, Witterick viewed the film at a screening in November 2011 at Congregation Habonim during the annual Holocaust Education Week in Toronto.

Within a year and a half, Witterick had self-published her book, which received favourable reviews.

Penguin picked it up and it has subsequently been published internationally.

According to court documents filed by Maltz, who is also a senior correspondent for the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, "With the exception of certain limited fictional aspects... the plot of [Witterick's] book is almost identical to that of the [film]."

The court documents outline a number of areas that overlap in the book and the film, including the actual names of the Polish heroines, the story of a German defector whom they sheltered, the hiding of some of the Jews in the pigsty above her hayloft and others in a hole dug under the kitchen floor.

"The tragic events that befall the Jewish families before they manage to find refuge with the Polish mother and daughter are a key part of the dramatic build-up in the [film], as they are in the book," state the court documents. "Many of the creative devices that the [filmmakers] used to design the narrative of the [film] and to illustrate the personality traits of the main characters are also incorporated in the book."

Witterick, however, told The CJN that "all the characters in the book are fictional because I created them."

A Taiwanese-Canadian who immigrated at age eight, Witterick said she has long been interested in the Holocaust. She lives among Jews and her son's best friends are Jewish.

"I could never understand why people didn't like Jewish people. I've always been really interested in the Holocaust. I myself am a child of immigrants, and I understand what it's like to be on the outside and being an underdog. So this kind of Holocaust story really resonates with me."

Witterick said she self-published the book and donated all its revenues to a number of charities.

When Penguin agreed to publish it, she donated 100 per cent of the advance to charities.

"My objective was never to make money on this book. My objective was to write a book to help young people understand what happened in the Holocaust," she said.

The case has yet to be heard in court.

ROSENGARTEN, Bertha - We sadly announce the passing of Bertha Rosengarten in hospital, on Wednesday, March 19th, 2014. Married just shy of 68 years, the beloved wife of William Rosengarten, loving mother of Roz Tobias, Linda Rosengarten, Rob Rose, and Leonard Luksenberg. She dearly loved her grandchildren Heather Tobias, Moe Luksenberg, and is predeceased by Barry Luksenberg. Predeceased by her wonderful brother Moishe Freedman and sister-in-law Grace Freedman, and Bertha's parents David and Bella Freedman. She will be greatly missed by her adored nieces and nephews. She held a special place for Rob's children and Roz and Robs' grandchildren. Her caregiver, Sheryll Corrales has been a great help, particularly to Bertha's needs in these last difficult days. Bertha will always be remembered for the attentive care she gave to her Velvu and family.

Noisy BDS doomsayers are bound to fail

Brian Thomas
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — I've just returned to Israel from the snow-covered, arctic wastes of the northeastern United States and Canada. As the Beatles once said, "Gee, it's good to be back home."

But oh what fun it was to be abroad, to represent Israel and to invite all and sundry to visit Israel and hear their reactions.

As I've explained before, there seems to be a push to make Israelis fearful that we're facing some kind of avalanche of isolation from the outside world. To scare us into believing unless we change our ways, nobody will like us any more. Somehow we're made to believe Israeli lives will be embittered by the concerted boycott, disinvestment and sanctions (BDS) movement. What a load of rubbish.

A long time ago, I wrote how a random security checkpoint delayed my return home from a concert. Just another minor inconvenience that all of us here in Israel suffer from time to time. We don't really whine about it like others would.

But sometimes good things come of these security checks: last year at the Jewish Federations of North America General Assembly in Jerusalem, I found myself queuing at the security checkpoint for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's speech alongside Audrey Jacobs, OurCrowd's vice-president for business development. Having previously worked with Israeli advocacy group StandWithUs, she knew of my writing and invited me to an OurCrowd event at the King David Hotel.

OurCrowd is a little over a year old and allows individual accredited investors worldwide to identify, research and invest in Israel's leading startups. They are a merger of the best bits of a publicly accessible crowd funding platform like KickStarter, individual angel investing and a fully fledged venture capital fund. At the end of their first year, they'd already invested more than $35 million (US) in more than 30 Israeli start-up firms.

So when I saw they would be holding an event in New York while I was in town, I signed up. The event was beautifully organized and held at the law offices of Greenberg Traurig LLP, in the iconic Met Life building right above Grand Central Terminal. Greenberg Traurig was keen to stress the firm's commitment to helping Israeli companies with international legal work.

OurCrowd's founder, Jon Medved, fresh from a number of speeches at AIPAC, introduced OurCrowd to a range of both existing investors and people new to the whole concept. Presentations from firms currently raising money followed. They included a security company that fights cyber threats using cognitive behavioural profiling, a software company for managing big data and clouds for enterprises and mobile platform for the conference world. The big data company is notable as OurCrowd is beginning to expand beyond Israeli companies. Others clearly appreciate Israeli help with their fundraising.

I spoke with many people attending. Some were Jews, some were non-Jews, but all were absolutely positive Israel is the place to turn to for exciting growth and development. This was a room buzzing with positive energy toward the Jewish state from people who feel there is a torrent of positive ideas flowing out of the land. Clearly, only fools would boycott Israel, and to their own very great detriment.

The security company, in particular, stood out as yet another brilliant new idea in computer security stemming from Israel's dominance in the field. Of course, the founders of the firm got their start in the Israel Defence Forces' ultra elite signals intelligence unit, 8200. Their ideas and software for protecting online login identity could rapidly sweep the industry and foil fraudsters.

The overwhelmingly positive feeling toward Israel extended to other spheres. I like to tell people I'm from Israel and see their reaction. I always encourage people to come and visit. On this trip, as is often the case, I encountered very few negative reactions. I know the negative is out there, but I don't seek it and it rarely finds me.

Today's anti-Israel boycott is the runt-child of the state-level Arab boycott of the late 1960s and '70s. As this crumbled or became irrelevant, it was replaced by a rag-tag bunch of street theatre artists who happened to have well-financed political and media backing.

There is a small core of BDS zealots who falsely conflate pluralistic, democratic Israel with apartheid South Africa. They've been doing this so long that they're drinking their own Kool-Aid. Their attempt to break Israel through an economic, cultural and academic boycott is doomed, because the existence of a Jewish Israel is just and incomparable to the old South Africa.

Moreover, South Africa was a commodity exporter in the 1970s and its products were easily replaceable.

Modern Israel exports high-tech knowledge. Whether it's in the pure intellectual realm of chip designs, mobile device applications or ultra sophisticated medical devices, Israel's exports are not interchangeable with products from anywhere else.

Israel's exports are often key drivers of competitive advantage for those business and military customers who purchase them. There are usually no comparable substitutes, and choosing not to trade with Israel is more likely to harm the boycotter than Israel.

It's clear the benefits of trade with Israel are too great for anyone sane to overlook. And even if we're led to believe the European Union foreign policy team wants to punish Israel – while embarrassing itself smiling with the Iranian terror overlords – individual EU countries, companies and people can't bring themselves to turn down the benefits of working with Israel.

No matter how I look at it, the massive noise generated by global PR campaigns against Israel is not widely matched by negative feelings on the ground, especially in North America. So many people either have no firm views or are easily swayed by the positive stuff that flows from Israel.

This is not the time to give up on our beliefs and sink into a funk. Israel is a gift to the world, and I know the doomsayers are lying.

Brian Thomas made aliyah from Britain in 2009 and owns a business in Israel.

JEWISH FAMILY &CHILD
EVERY STEP OF THE WAY.

DIRECTOR OF PROGRAMS

Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) is a multi-service social service agency supporting the needs of the Jewish and broader communities in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) and York Region. Our client-centred services focus on three outcome areas:

Increasing Safety and Security, Improving Mental Health and Wellness and Reducing the Effects of Poverty. We are mandated by the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services as a Children's Aid Society for all Jewish children and families in the GTA.

Jewish Family & Child seeks a Director of Programs commencing May 2014.
The Director will serve as a member of the Agency's senior management team in a decision-making and leadership role with reference to all programs and services. The incumbent will play an active role in Jewish Family & Child's management of strategic change, emphasizing client-centred service and community impact. Unsubtle prescription for a complex problem

How to Be Secular: A Call to Arms for Religious Freedom
by Jacques Berlinerblau

Recent events in our country, particularly the government of Quebec's promotion of its so-called "charter of values," have caused many Canadians to think about the proper relationship between government and religion. I hoped How to Be Secular: A Call to Arms for Religious Freedom, by Jacques Berlinerblau, professor at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., might shed some theoretical light on the place of religion in the west. Unfortunately, it didn't help much.

I liked the way Berlinerblau lays out the historical background of the problem. He gives a cogent summary of the history of the separation of church and state in the United States. The American founders, with the possible exception of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, were not strongly committed to the idea of separation. They were in favour of religious freedom, but for most of them that meant founding a Christian country where all denominations of Protestant Christianity would feel at home.

They agreed that no one branch of Protestant Christianity should be the officially established religion of the country, but some of the founders and their followers, for a few decades, and perhaps beyond, saw no problem with the possibility that a smaller unit, like one of the individual states of the union, might have an established religious identity. When the United States (and for that matter, Canada) was born, no one would have wanted all levels of government to separate themselves from all manifestations of religion.

The heyday of separation of church and state in the United States was, Berlinerblau explains, from the 1940s to the 1970s. The Supreme Court at the time took on an activist role, broadly interpreting the idea that religion should not be established, and outlawing such things as school prayer, which the founders and almost all Americans for the first two centuries had considered part of the fabric of American society. Here in Canada, too, school prayer – generally The Lord's Prayer, (Matthew 6:9-13, a prayer introduced by Jesus' words, "Pray then like this") – was an integral part of our allegedly non-denominational public school system.

No doubt, Jews and members of other minority groups have benefitted from the mid-20th-century move toward more separation of church and state, and view this as an advance. Berlinerblau is concerned that right-wing Christian forces in the United States are trying to undo these advances and return religion to a prominent place in the public sphere. His book is an action plan to combat this by rallying forces that support a secular worldview.

But Berlinerblau's conception of the ideal state is never made clear in this book. Just how much separation between church and state does he desire? Should Christmas (in the United States and Canada) and Good Friday (here in Canada) stop being civic holidays? Should we adopt the French laicité model, now being promoted in Quebec, and not allow anyone representing or paid by the government to display prominent religious symbols? Should we stop allowing tax breaks for people who contribute money to churches and synagogues, because such tax breaks are, without a doubt, a way that government supports religious institutions? I was hoping to find some subtle distinctions in this book, but all I found was the claim that more separation of church and state is better than less.

Since the back cover of the book lists Berlinerblau as director of Georgetown University's Program for Jewish Civilization, I had been hoping for some insight into Jews, Judaism, and the question of church and state, but I was disappointed. He does discuss Jews in the United States, expressing the hope that if other religions learned from Judaism, there would be less of a problem of religion in the public square. He notes that a large percentage of Jews define themselves as secular and wishes that members of other religious groups would follow that model. He argues that being religious, on the one hand, and being secular or supporting a secular worldview, on the other, are not mutually exclusive.

It is true that many Jews call themselves secular, even though they identify as Jewish, but that's because Jewish identity need not be religious – it can be national, cultural or ethnic. The latest survey of U.S. Jews by the Pew Religion and Public Life Research Project reports that almost one one-third of American Jews born after 1980 refer to themselves as "Jews of no religion." But this may be unique to Judaism. Just because being a "secular Jew" is possible does not mean that being a "secular Lutheran" or a "secular Sikh" is.

Berlinerblau's hope that more people in the United States start to identify as "secular" the way so many Jews do is ultimately just a code for the hope that more people in the United States exclude religion from their lives or, at least, make it peripheral to their core values. In the end, his hoped-for solution to the problem boils down to the obvious point: if fewer people in the United States take religion seriously, there will be fewer problems of religion and state. This is not a subtle solution to the complex problem.

Berlinerblau's fear of right-wing Christians trying to de-secularize the United States is well placed. But we will have to await a more carefully reasoned and creative book to really grapple with the appropriate place of religion in modern western countries.

One of the most hotly debated topics in contemporary biblical studies is the extent to which the Hebrew Bible or Tanakh reflects the actual history of the ancient Israelites. In this year's Wolinsky Lectures, two of the leading international experts in their respective fields of biblical archaeology (Avraham Faust) and biblical exegesis (Christoph Levin) will endeavour to provide possible answers to the question of how to use the Hebrew Bible as a historical source.

Telling a different kind of Jewish story

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

Steven Bergson was five years old when he picked up his first comic book. It didn't take long until he was hooked.

"Once I came across a comic, I wanted more. [I liked] the colourful superheroes, the super powered good guys beating up the bad guys," said Bergson, a former librarian who never lost his appreciation for comics and graphic novels. "I still read superhero comics sometimes."

As he got older, Bergson, a research administrator at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, began reading an array of comics, including Jewish-themed graphic novels.

"I found it was unusual for them to be out there," he said of Jewish comics like Maus by Art Spiegelman and To the Heart of the Storm, by Will Eisner. "There's a lot more out there than there used to be. I think people are more aware of the new stuff, not the old stuff."

Around seven years ago, Bergson first had the idea to create a Jewish comic anthology – a collection that would bring older Jewish comics together with new stories. But he quickly learned the idea was easier said than done.

"I started with an American Jewish publisher. I essentially got a rejection," he said.

After many years and different publishers, Bergson came across an article in The CJN last October about Andy Stanleigh of Alternate History Comics, which publishes comics and graphic novels. When approached, Stanleigh was more than just intrigued.

"I said, 'Hey, why would anybody pass this up?' (Bergson) has been working on it for the last five or six years. He had the titles and the artists that he wanted to include," said Stanleigh. "He basically handed it off to me."

To fund the project, called The Jewish Comix Anthology: Volume 1, Stanleigh turned to the crowdfunding site Kickstarter, where his fundraising goal of $50,000 was surpassed by more than $2,000.

While Bergman was surprised by the funds, Stanleigh wasn't.

"I knew it was going to be a really nice, wide-reaching thing," he said.

The project, which should be ready for print in May and released in June, is a mix of newly commissioned stories and older works that are being republished.

Comics from artists like Spiegelman, Eisner, Michael Netzer and Robert Crumb will be included in the anthology, along with a story written by Bergson about a Jew who finds a clever way of dealing with anti-Semitism.

One of the stories included is a little-known piece of Jewish folklore written several centuries ago. The tale is about a modest Jewish virgin who is kidnapped by her city's ruler. When asked why, the ruler explains that he's infatuated with her because of her beautiful eyes. In an effort to keep her virginity, the girl asks to get ready for the ruler in a private room, where she gouges out her eyes. After handing them off to the ruler, she's finally sent home.

While the story is dark, Bergson enjoyed its irony.

"I think the fact that it was ever told at all and the fact that it seems to no longer be discussed tells us something about Jewish storytelling," he said.

Two Brothers by Haiwei-Hou is one of several comics by Jewish artists included in the upcoming Jewish Comix Anthology. For more information visit www.jewishcomicsanthology.com.

Actress enjoys racy role in 50 Shades! musical

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

New York-based actress Alexis Field says she is called upon to do some pretty wild things in 50 Shades! The Musical – The Original Parody, playing at Toronto's St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, Bluma Appel Theatre from April 1 to 13.

"One of the craziest things I do is racy and I do it right out in the audience," Field says. "One night my brother was two feet away from me. He was a little shocked but he was laughing."

Field – who wouldn't say what the particular "racy thing" is – says she has since embraced it and it is now her favourite part of the show because she says she fully commits to it and doesn't worry about looking silly or making people feel uncomfortable.

50 Shades! The Musical opens with a ladies book club deciding to read Fifty Shades of Grey, the popular erotic book by E L James. The show features 11 original songs including They Get Nasty I Don't Make Love, and There's a Hole Inside of Me.

"50 Shades is a musical parody where you experience the book through the eyes of three book club ladies," Field says. The book is about the transformation of Anastasia Steele, who is a young, recent graduate of college, as she finds her sexual identity through Christian Grey.

Field plays two characters, one of them is Bev, one of the book club ladies.

"I would say that Bev is in the middle of the spectrum. One lady, Pam, is a little more of a risk taker sexually and you have Carol who really hasn't figured anything out for herself yet. Bev's this loveable character who you just feel sorry for through a good portion of the show," she says.

"Bev is kind of a mixture of both of those women. She might have tried out a few things with her husband but she's a novice when it comes to her own sexual freedom and expression. You see all three of these women go through their own transformation as they read the book. They kind of act as a Greek chorus – or narrators – they're the link between the story and the audience members."

Field also plays Katherine Cavanaugh, who in the book is Anastasia's studious best friend. In this production, she's a drunken sorority girl gone completely wrong.

"One of the greatest things about this show is it is so funny. I have never heard laughter like this from an audience before," she says. "And, I think laughter is the best medicine for everything and you are sure to get a whole lot of that in this show. You will be shocked too, it is very racy but you are going to have a blast, even if you haven't read the book. You might even learn a thing or two that you might want to take into the bedroom."

Alexis Field

Field is joined on stage by Tiffany Dissette, BJ Gruber, Eileen Patterson, Nick Semar, Sheila O'Connor, Datus Puryear, Jack Boice and Caroline Reade, along with a live band.

Field, who was born in Los Angeles and raised in Boca Raton, Fla. grew up going to Jewish day school and attending her local JCC. She sang in the synagogue and led services at school. She even contemplated being a cantor.

"Singing has always been important to me because singing is my way of connecting to my Jewish identity and my way of connecting to something greater than myself. When I act and sing onstage, it is not going to mean anything unless there is something going on internally and I am connecting. One of the first ways I was able to do that was in synagogue. My theatrical training was actually through the Jewish Community Center and Jewish day school."

She enjoys yoga and loves to play the ukulele which she brought with her to Toronto. Her other theatre credits include The Spitfire Grill and Speech & Debate.

50 Shades comes to Toronto after enjoying sold out runs in Chicago, New York and the Edinburgh Film Festival. Tickets can be purchased at St. Lawrence Centre box office, online: ticketmaster.ca; or 1-855-899-STLC (7852). For more show information visit www.50shadesthemusical.com.

Most consular services were suspended

Our consular services were also suspended, except for life-threatening situations or burials in Israel.

While the soft arts of networking, persuasion and letters have often taken a back seat in the Israeli imagination to the very genuine military heroics that have safeguarded our country, a full telling of our history would include countless examples of tenacious and deft diplomacy, advocacy and international alliance-building, without which Israel would not be the success story that it is today.

Through the decades, the unsung heroes of Israel's diplomatic corps have secured agreements, scuppered hostile initiatives, created diplomatic and economic opportunities, and built partnerships and alliances, each of which has made a concrete contribution to our country's standing and its ability to realize fundamental national interests on the international stage.

Indeed, the international support and understanding Israel enjoys today is in no small part the product of our diplomats' unwavering efforts in the public arena and in the corridors of power to present and advance Israel's case, to build empathy and familiarity with our circumstances and forge a crucial appreciation of the shared interests and common values that bind us to the international community and bind that community to us.

In Israel today, there are public voices questioning whether we even need a foreign ministry, yet Israel continues to face immense diplomatic challenges from Iran to the Palestinian issue, terror and more. Even in friendly environments such as Canada, but far more dangerously in Europe and elsewhere, we face an organized assault on Israel's legitimacy designed to turn influential publics into adversaries and enemies. We also face stiff competition for investment and trade opportunities, even as our economic well-being is ever-more irreversibly tied to the global economy.

Meeting all these challenges requires diplomatic deployment of the highest calibre. And this is what Israel's foreign service provides, day in day out.

To underscore the point, try to imagine what Israel's international standing, security and economy would look like today were it not for the work of our diplomats over the last 15 years in handling the international and public diplomacy surrounding the Camp David peace talks of 2000, the so-called second intifadah, the disengagement process, the second Lebanon War, operations Cast Lead and Pillar of Cloud, the Gilad Schalit saga, the Mavi Marmara incident, the Brand Israel campaign, the accession of Israel to the OECD (Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development) and to CERN (the European Organization for Nuclear Research), the renewal of Israel's membership in the European Union's multibillion-dollar research and development framework, the P5+1 process vis-à-vis the Iranian nuclear program, countless governmental trade delegations from across the world, the international designation of Hezbollah as a terrorist organization, the international isolation of Hamas, the Palestinians' 2011 unilateral declaration of independence attempt at the United Nations, the parrying of hostile cases at the International Court of Justice, the constant nurturing and updating of our partnership with the Jewish communities of the world, the outreach to new partners in Asia, Central Asia and Africa, and more.

DJ Schneeweiss

Of course, there is no doubt that many of Israel's international achievements are not the Foreign Ministry's alone. National leaders, other ministries and agencies and local partners, often from amongst our Jewish brethren, all make their contributions. But it is no less true that none of these achievements (and so many more) could ever have been secured without the global and local leadership, access, influence and impact that only a dedicated and skilled professional foreign service can provide.

In short, the world would be a far less benign and indeed more dangerous place for Israel than any of us would like if it were not for the efforts of our diplomatic service.

Yet, this is exactly the kind of world that is potentially staring us in the face.

For over a decade now, the salaries of Israel's diplomats serving abroad have not been updated, even just to keep pace with increases in the cost of living. As a result, many diplomats find themselves unable to make ends meet (literally, unable to cover fundamental monthly outlays) and are forced to avoid certain postings or abandon the foreign service altogether in order to survive financially. The Foreign Ministry thus often finds itself unable to fill key middle-ranking positions. The spouses of Israel's diplomats more often than not have to sacrifice their careers as a result of foreign postings, often leaving these families with only one steady income and one pension – a further driver of financial difficulty and mid-career resignations. And then there are all the intangible costs and sacrifices of foreign service – the heightened security risks, the constant dislocation of children, the distance from family and friends, the very real loneliness, not to mention the professional frustrations of never having the budgets or resources to meet the demands and potential of our work (many of our embassies have smaller staffs today than they did a generation ago, despite the explosion in the pace and breadth of our international engagement).

The net effect of these conditions is that Israel's foreign service today is disillusioned, frustrated, bitter and disoriented. We all continue to do our best to fight the good fight, but deep down, there is a real malaise, only made worse by insensitive and hurtful public charges from parts of the government impugning our motives or blithely – and dangerously –presuming that Israel's diplomats play no role in our country's security and well-being.

But that's the half-full side of the equation, the one in which there still are capable, dedicated and experienced diplomats willing to go to bat anew for the country every day.

The real fear, if the current crisis is not resolved and work conditions restored to a fair and reasonable level, is that Israel's diplomatic corps will, in a very few short years, become a mere shell, void of talented or capable people, who – quite reasonably – will seek to fulfil their desire to serve through other avenues. While it will no doubt continue to exist in name and form, the substance of our foreign service, its ability to stymie and pre-empt negative international developments and its ability to identify and realize the potential of positive ones, will continue to erode, leaving a rump that might be able to go through the motions but won't be able to deliver the results the country needs.

Can Israel survive this? Of course. And it will. But whether over time it will continue to thrive as we want and need it to is another matter entirely.

The equation is simple: if Israel's diplomats can't make ends meet, then Israel won't be able to make its international ends meet.

The decision to suspend regular consulate services and efforts to protect and advance Israel's interests here in Canada and around the world was not one we took lightly, and we regret any inconvenience or disappointment that we may be causing. But it is our belief that the fate of Israel's foreign service – and, by extension, the fate of Israel's crucial ability to effectively have an impact on the world around us in the years to come – hangs today in the balance.

That's why we're using every tool at our disposal to save it.

DJ Schneeweiss is the consul general of Israel to Toronto and Western Canada.

Kosher food can unite us

Kosher Living
Richard Rabkin

Around a month ago, my wife and I gave birth to a beautiful baby girl. OK it was mostly my wife, but you know what I mean.

The excitement began in the wee hours of Friday morning, and as the day progressed in the hospital, I started thinking about kosher food and Shabbat. What would we eat? How would I recite Kiddush, make Hamotzi and light candles? I remembered hearing about an organization called Bikkur Cholim, a volunteer-driven charity that looks after the needs of Jewish people in hospital, so I contacted them. Within a few hours, someone came to our hospital room with literally bags of kosher food, grape juice for Kiddush, electric Shabbat candles, even spices for Havdalah. The food is free and the person delivering it is a volunteer. In the few moments I had to speak with him, I learned that he was just a regular guy – an accountant – who takes off Fridays from work to volunteer.

After a quiet Shabbat with our new baby, the doctors told us they had detected some abnormalities on X-rays they had taken. They were concerned and wanted to transfer her to the intensive care unit at the Hospital for Sick Children. So the day after giving birth to our baby girl, we were in an ambulance being transferred to a high-risk intensive care unit for some unspecified condition.

Friends in our community heard and told us not to worry about our two kids at home. They would take care of them. They arranged sleepovers and carpools and meals. Bikkur Cholim received a notification that we had been moved to another hospital and contacted us and asked if we needed continued meal service. Grateful, we accepted.

We also received a phone call from another organization called Chai Lifeline, a charity dedicated to helping sick children and their families. They offered to take care of our older kids for all of Sunday so that we could stay with the baby at the hospital. They said they would take the kids out for the day and have them bathed and ready for bed when we returned in the evening. When I heard this, I actually laughed out loud. The idea that my kids would let a bunch of strange girls give them a bath was, well, laughable.

Sunday night after a long day at the hospital, I returned home to find my kids playing with a Chai Lifeline volunteer. They were in their pyjamas.

"Why is your hair wet?" I asked my daughter.

"They gave me a bath," she said nonchalantly.

Stunned, I sat down at the table and ate while I listened to my kids tell me about the fun places they went and the kosher restaurants they ate at. Then I heard the water in the sink running and turned around and saw Miriam, the Chai Lifeline volunteer, washing our dishes!

"You don't need to worry about washing dishes right now," she said.

I cannot count the amount of people who approached me in shul and asked what they could do to help. And help they did. For three weeks, we didn't cook a meal, because people in our community rotated, cooking meals – kosher of course – on our behalf.

After two weeks in the hospital, the doctors told us we could go home. In the end, they said they would monitor the baby's condition, which with time would likely go away on its own.

I've had a few days to reflect on our ordeal, and I realize that it was my commitment to keeping kosher that actually forced us to reach out to the Jewish community – whether it was Bikkur Cholim, Chai Lifeline or our friends. The Talmud says that when we visit someone who is sick, we take away one-sixtieth of their illness. Obviously, that doesn't mean that if 60 people visit you, your illness will disappear. Rather, by visiting, they take on a small portion of our burden. When you see that others are with you in your time of need, it helps. I know it did for us.

The Jewish poet Achad Ha'am famously said, "More than the Jews have kept the Sabbath, the Sabbath has kept the Jewish people." Over the past month, I've developed my own variation: more than the Jewish People have kept kosher, keeping kosher has kept the Jewish People.

Brisket a special meal all year round

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Brisket is one of those festive Passover and year-round dishes that appeals to carnivores of all ages.

Food writer and author Bonnie Stern says that she often serves brisket at Friday night dinners. "My kids love it and so do my friends. I make it for Passover and everybody really looks forward to it.

"If I want to try something new, I also have to make brisket."

She says that while she tries a variety of brisket recipes during the year, her barbecued-style brisket is the family favourite. "The recipe has evolved over the years, but this one is adapted to use kosher for Passover ingredients."

She says the secret to making brisket is to buy a good one and then cook it until it's fork tender. "I always buy a whole brisket. That way you get a single side that is leaner and a double side that is juicer."

In my own family, the most anticipated dish at our seder is my sister's sweet brisket. It is the benchmark for rating all other briskets. And mine never tastes as good as my sister's, according to my middle son. "Why can't you get Auntie Sherri's recipe?" he asks every time I serve brisket.

The truth is I'm lazy. I prefer to use a very simple recipe that is practically patchke-free.

A few years ago, I told my friend Arlene Charezenko that I had never made a brisket, because I thought cooking a roast was beyond my culinary abilities. She laughed. "Brisket is the easiest thing in the world to make."

She gave me a classic brisket recipe with three ingredients – onion soup, cranberry sauce and water.

I have since made variations of this recipe by substituting duck sauce or apricot jam for cranberry sauce, especially at Passover. I often use orange juice or leftover wine instead of water.

And even though Son No. 2 complains about my brisket, he usually has a second helping.

BONNIE STERN'S BARBECUE-STYLE BRISKET

Rub
2 tbsp. paprika
1 tbsp. kosher salt
1/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. ground cumin (available kosher for Passover)
1 tbsp. granulated garlic
1 tsp. black pepper
1 whole brisket (about 8 pounds)

Barbecue Sauce
1 1/2 cups barbecue sauce
1 cup red wine or water
1/3 cup honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. cayenne pepper
3 large onions, sliced
1 head of garlic broken into cloves and peeled

For the rub, combine paprika with salt, sugar, cumin, granulated garlic and pepper. Pat rub into both sides of the brisket. Marinate overnight if possible or cook right away.,

Prepare barbecue sauce by combining commercial barbecue sauce with wine or water, honey, lemon juice and cayenne.

Place onions and garlic cloves in a Dutch or deep roasting dish. Place brisket fat side up on the onion and garlic layer. Pour barbecue sauce over the brisket. Cover brisket with parchment paper and if possible bring sauce to a boil on the stove. Cover tightly and braise in a 325-degree oven for 4 to 5 hours.

If you can't cook your brisket on the stove top, put it directly into the oven. Check every 45 minutes to make sure there is enough liquid in the pan and add more if necessary. Depending on the size of the brisket, cook until it is completely tender and can be pierced with a fork. If the top has not browned cook uncovered another 15 to 20 minutes.

Remove brisket from the juice and refrigerate meat and sauce in separate containers. Brisket is easier to carve if it's cold, so it's best to make it a day or two ahead. Skim fat from the sauce before using.

To reheat, cover sliced brisket with sauce in a pan covered tightly with tin foil. Cook at 350 for 45-60 minutes.

The dark secret of Quebec nationalism

Gil Troy
In Montreal

As Quebec suffers through another dishonest, demagogic provincial election campaign, wherein the Parti Québécois plays its "wink, wink, nudge, nudge" flirtation with separatism and referendums, Quebec's Jews are panicking, justifiably.

Quebec separatists are playing to the "yahoo vote," the least enlightened, sophisticated, intolerant voters. Their leaders enjoy riling up the masses, unleashing a xenophobic us-versus-them nationalism. Much of the prejudice is directed at Muslims – Jews are often collateral damage in this truly provincial assault on "the others," those who dare to differ.

Still, while assessing this want-our-cake-and-eat-it-too movement that is all too often simplistic, spoiled and snivelling, refusing to take responsibility for its words and actions, it's worth contemplating a mystery whose answer is itself revealing: why don't Quebec Separatists love Zionists?

Let me be clear. I'm not talking about all separatists. In both Montreal and Jerusalem, I've had rich, exciting, inspiring exchanges with Quebec nationalists about the challenges of building a constructive national identity in a modern world. In intense, meaningful, off-the-record conversations, we've shared concerns about the me, me, me, my, my, my, hyper-individualist world of the iPad and iPod, which obliterates values, subverts collective solidarity and addicts our young to materialism and immediate gratification. We agree that we all need to have a deeper sense of history than the latest YouTube sensations of singing babies or playful cats. And we rejoice in the anchors, frameworks and ties we gain from being part of a community.

Human beings need to be positioned in three dimensions, both vertically and horizontally: vertically meaning with a proud past, a satisfying present and an appealing future, with a spiritual dimension as an added bonus; and horizontally, meaning connected to one another communally and existentially.

Given that resonance, Quebec separatists and Zionists should be friends. Quebec separatists should turn to Jewish nationalists for reassurance that a distinct language, a particular narrative, a defined sense of community, can be the basis for an enduring national identity, even if you've never had your own state. Quebecers should learn from the extraordinary success of the Zionist project – a.k.a. the State of Israel – about the joys and challenges of nation-building and about the process of transitioning from a people without a state to a fully functioning nation-state.

Moreover, for those proud Quebecers who nevertheless pragmatically prefer to live in Canada, they can learn from non-Israeli Jewish Zionists about different skills. Jews are experts at being loyal citizens of many different countries while preserving a distinct identity. For centuries, Jews have created a win-win, benefiting from belonging to a particular community while also functioning in great, thriving liberal democracies such as the United States and Canada.

Yet, despite all these overlapping interests and all these resonances, many Quebec separatists are often intensely anti-Zionist. Why?

Let's acknowledge Canadian Jews' own double discomfort with this conversation. Canadian Jews don't like emphasizing their distinct national identity too much, nor do Canadian Jews, most of whom are federalists, wish to offer Quebec separatists tutorials on nation-building.

But that, of course, isn't the whole story. For decades, most Quebec separatists have bashed Zionists and Zionism for three main reasons. First, they've swallowed the Palestinian propaganda line that universalizes the fight against Israel by demonizing Zionism inaccurately as imperialist, colonialist and racist. Anti-Zionism, the world's trendiest hatred, has become a central tenet of far-left ideology. Many separatists are happy to join the pile-on. It makes them feel worldly.

Moreover, many separatists' reading of Zionism has been distorted by their disdain for most Canadian Jews' federalism. Rather than seeing the complexity of different identities in today's world – especially modern Jews' identity – simplistic separatists prefer to place "the Jews" in a box.

And therein lies the third reason. Unfortunately, for too many separatists, the us-versus-them box that they and their leaders construct as a foundation for their movement builds their own sense of "us" by demonizing the Jews and others as "them."

Nationalism is beautiful when it cultivates solidarity from within, but it turns ugly when it becomes more about demonizing "them" rather than nurturing an "us." That is Palestinian nationalism's great weakness and sin, with too many Palestinians dedicated to destroying the Jewish state rather than building their own. And, I regret to conclude, that perhaps in that xenophobic, nihilistic ugliness, we learn the deep dark secret of Quebec separatism, too.

Quebecers, Gil Troy writes, should learn from the extraordinary success of the State of Israel about the joys and challenges of nation building. Pictured is the clock tower of Quebec's Parliament building.

Putin Slammed

NEW YORK — Leading Ukrainian Jews took out a full-page ad in the New York Times slamming Russian President Vladimir Putin for maligning the treatment of Jews in Ukraine. The ad, which also appeared in the National Post, Israel's Ha'aretz and the international New York Times, accuses Putin of spreading lies about how minorities, including Jews, are treated in Ukraine.

Stones To Play Israel

TEL AVIV — It's official: the Rolling Stones will play Tel Aviv. "Today, the longest negotiation of my career is coming to an end," concert promoter Shuki Weiss said March 25 in announcing the June 4 performance. The hype surrounding the official confirmation was mixed with anger over high ticket prices. Calls to boycott the concert started surfacing on social media, as tickets run from 695 shekels ($199) for a space on the lawn to 2,850 shekels ($818) for a VIP ticket. The concert, which falls at the end of Shavuot in Israel, will begin at 8:30 pm, with the holiday ending at 8:24 p.m. The concert is one of only 14 planned in Europe this summer.

Students Back BDS

LONDON — The King's College London Student Union voted to endorse the boycott, sanctions and divestment movement against Israel. The 15-point motion passed March 25 at the students' general meeting by a vote of 348-252. Following the vote, the college's administration distanced itself from the measure, Israel's Ha'aretz reported. The motion calls for researching the college's "investments, partnerships, and contracted companies, including subcontractors, that may be implicated in violating Palestinian human rights as stated by the BDS movement," and to pressure the college to divest from companies found to be "directly or indirectly supporting the Israeli occupation and apartheid policies."

Cotler Proud Of Russia Ban

MONTREAL — Former Justice Minister Irwin Cotler says he considers his being banned from Russia "a badge of honour."

Irwin Cotler

The Montreal Liberal MP is among 13 Canadian legislators and officials whom Russia announced March 24 aren't allowed into the country. It was a response to sanctions Canada imposed on Russia for its annexation of Crimea.

"I wear my exclusion from Russia as a badge of honour and am proud to be in such distinguished company," Cotler said. "I have no intention of visiting Siberia… have no desire to visit Moscow and be poisoned as happened on my last trip".

Cotler said he was referring to 2006 when he was in Russia as part of a parliamentary delegation. He dined in Moscow with NDP MP Joe Comartin, and they ordered exactly the same meal. Comartin was fine, but Cotler became "violently ill" soon after.

"I started to throw up blood. I called the people in the hotel and told them I needed a doctor. Instead of sending a doctor, they sent people to clean up all the blood – in other words, all the evidence that a doctor would need."

With the help of the Canadian Embassy, Cotler was admitted to hospital in Moscow, where he stayed several days, but never learned what was wrong with him. His symptoms were like those of KGB defector Alexander Litvinenko, who was fatally poisoned in 2006. "Except that they, in my case, probably just wanted to intimidate me and temporarily disable me, but not to kill me."

Cotler said he spoke with a Russian Embassy official in Ottawa on another matter in 2010 and was invited to visit Russia. Cotler replied, "'You know, the last time when I was there, I was poisoned.' And then, just like that, the answer was, 'We're sorry. That was a mistake. It won't happen again.'"

Cancer survivor celebrates 10-year milestone

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

Ten years ago, Melissa Lieberman and her husband were about to buy a double stroller for their twins, who were due in a month. And then she felt a lump in her breast.

"It was right during the Christmas holidays," said Cantor Eric Moses, Lieberman's husband. "[The twins] were due to be born somewhere toward the end of January. People are sensitive to their body more when pregnant. She felt something that didn't feel quite right."

Although Lieberman's doctor decided to do a biopsy, the couple didn't think much of it until they came in for a routine appointment.

"[The doctor] calls us in. He shut down the office and told us the news," she said. This is when Lieberman, already the mother of an 18-month-old boy, learned she had breast cancer.

"We were shocked and overwhelmed. It's hard to explain the reaction. When you're pregnant and expecting twins, that's the last thing on your mind. From that moment on, we were just go, go, go. We had to do as much research as we could, get as many doctors involved."

Before Lieberman's treatment could begin, doctors had to induce labour. She then underwent a double mastectomy, aggressive chemotherapy and several other surgeries.

Soon after her diagnosis became known, the community support began. Friends, doctors, members of the family's synagogue and complete strangers reached out to help.

"The support from the community was incredible," Moses said. "Challah would show up every Friday, and I still don't know who to thank.

"When you know people care about you, worry about you, are praying for you... you're just overwhelmed by incredible acts of kindness. It gives you strength and hope to keep going."

Now, Lieberman is ready to celebrate a huge milestone. The mother of three has been cancer-free for 10 years.

"Typically, after people have been cancer-free for 10 years, their chances of recurrence lessens," Moses said.

"We wanted to respect her values."

We needed a funeral that was economical. However, we didn't want to lose the Jewish traditions that were so important in our mother's life. Hebrew Basic Burial arranged a service that was fully observant. She would be proud knowing how we honoured her wishes.

TribeFest 2014 brought the chevrah together

Kortney L. Shapiro
Special to The CJN

What's better than taking a vacation with approximately 1,300 of your closest friends from across North America to learn about community, leadership and tikun olam while simultaneously celebrating the festive holiday of Purim in one of the most culturally stimulating and vibrant cities state-side?

Last month, I had the opportunity to attend TribeFest in New Orleans. Together with other young professionals and community leaders, many of whom came from the 156 Jewish federations who make up the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) family. Dubbed "the" young adult Jewish youth gathering of the year, TribeFest boasted a lineup of prominent speakers, interactive sessions, and memorable events.

During TribeFest, I was afforded the opportunity to participate in the Leadership Development Institute program (LDI), a companion program to TribeFest for young leaders ages 22 to 45 seeking to advance both their outreach skills and networking opportunities. In a room of more than 100 young professionals, we learned the power of storytelling and relationship-building. It was enlightening to hear from other federations who provided us with guidance as to how they confront challenges when trying to get other young professionals involved and passionate about giving back and becoming a part of community.

One of my favourite parts of TribeFest's programming each year is the Main Stage plenary session. Main Stage brings the entire contingency together in a main hall, where they are treated to various speakers and performers. Upon hearing the opening words of the Canadian national anthem, our group of 35 loud Canucks stood on our chairs and sang with passion as the entire room turned to see us draped in our best Canadiana. I felt proud to be a part of this experience with my fellow Canadians, many of whom were attending for the first time.

TribeFest 2014 co-chairs David Kline and Emma Samuels told the crowd what drove them to become involved in community.

Samuels, speaking with The CJN following the conference about her time planning and organizing TribeFest said, "there was never a dull moment while collaborating [the] countless speakers, programs, organizations and local communities."

"The enthusiasm of almost 1,300 young adult Jews at TribeFest in New Orleans was infectious," she said.

"Tribefest created a platform to connect participants to their Jewish values and importantly, [to] one another, which will help reinvigorate our communities and strengthen our ties to our culture and heritage."

Other notable speakers included Scandal and West Wing star Joshua Malina, who relayed to the crowd, with a biting sense of humour, his personal experiences connecting his family to Judaism and how playing an active role his community has positively impacted his life.

I approached Malina during the boat cruise to chat and take a photo. Regardless of his high-profile position, in that moment we were both just two young Jewish leaders enjoying an evening of shmoozing and celebration.

Also addressing the conference was Avital Zeisler, who trained at the National Ballet School of Canada and has since overcome a traumatic assault. She is now the founder of the Soteria Method, an a self-defence and fitness system geared to women. She captivated the audience as she spoke openly about her experiences, and her rise to becoming an acclaimed self-defence instructor in New York.

She finished her speech with five simple, yet powerful words, "Go and create your life."

We had the opportunity to really see New Orleans throughout the conference. From walking the famous Bourbon Street, winding our way through the French Quarter, to enjoying powdered beignets at the celebrated Café Du Monde after a night out on Frenchmen Street in the Faubourg Marigny neighbourhood, seeing the city's acclaimed live jazz and contemporary performers. We spent Sunday evening with the entire TribeFest contingency on the Natchez Riverboat, organized by JNOLA. As we danced atop the Mississippi, it was an incredible feeling to have the opportunity to celebrate together under a star-splattered southern sky.

From my own experience having attended TribeFest before, I can honestly say that I have never felt so at home among such a large group of passionate people who wear their hearts, communities and ruach on their sleeves.

I am already looking forward to the next conference, the JFNA's annual General Assembly, which will be taking place in Washington, D.C. this year. As for the next TribeFest, I can't wait to once again meet with my international chevrah, who at this point have become more than that – they have become family. One day I hope to organize such an incredible event.

In the meantime, I will continue learning and meeting other passionate leaders who make this community who we are today: proud, diverse and not afraid to get up and inspire one another to make a change, one tribe at a time.

Kortney L. Shapiro is pursuing her J.D. at Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto.

Lashon hara and The CJN

In his essay on last week's Torah reading, Parsha Tazria, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks presented a history of lashon hara – evil speech – and a handy reminder of the consequences of this wicked sin. It particularly caught my attention because I've been thinking a lot lately about lashon hara. More specifically, I've been thinking about this new job I have and how the prohibition against evil speech impacts it. I'd like to tell you now what I've come up with, because it informs where The Canadian Jewish News is going.

I suppose I could start by defining what I mean by lashon hara, but I think you all know: the stories we tell each other about each other. Sometimes we do it to hurt those of whom we speak, but mostly I don't think it's really insidious at all. We're just passing the time, looking for something – anything – to talk about, to keep us occupied. Even so, deep down, I'd like to think we all know it's wrong.

I've been hearing a lot more lashon hara in the three months since I became editor of this newspaper – I guess that's not a surprise, but it disturbs me nonetheless, and I'd like to do my part to stop it. Now, I won't tell you how to live your lives, but what I can tell you is how I intend to operate The CJN: there will be no gossip here. So if that's what you thought our new, "edgier" direction was all about (notwithstanding my Purim column), I'm afraid you've been mistaken.

At the same time, you deserve to know what's going on when it comes to issues that affect you and your community, and we believe it's our duty to tell you about them. You can expect that we will, and in a more vigorous way than you may be used to from The CJN (there's the "edgier"). But it will always be with the mindset to serve and improve the Jewish community, and mindful not to reduce the conversation to lashon hara.

It's an auspicious time of year on the Jewish calendar (though when isn't it an auspicious time?). This month we celebrate the birth of the Jewish People on Passover – it's a time for beginnings, and in that spirit we are preparing to present to you a brand new CJN. Next week, we reveal our redesigned paper and a new era in the history of The Canadian Jewish News.

In many ways, the April 10 edition of The CJN will appear to be a radical departure from what you've been accustomed to for so many years. There will be new voices, new opinions and a new energy. But we've left some traditional things in place. I'd like to think that first and foremost among them is a recognition that the purpose of The CJN is to serve as an independent voice for the Jewish community. That hasn't changed at all.

Nor has the understanding that we must tread the fine line between lashon hara and essential information carefully. I guess we all, in our own ways, have to deal with that.

Close the consulates

I find it in poor taste for The Canadian Jewish News to be used as the venue for an Israeli diplomat, who is the head of mission in the Israeli Consulate in Toronto, to publicly, while posted in a foreign country, vent his personal salary dispute ("Desperate times, desperate measures," The CJN, March 27).

We welcome the consul general attending dinners and other fundraising events. However, my sympathy cannot be with the gentleman while hospitals in Israel are suffering from high deficits and mounting healthcare costs.

Israel is not an overly rich country and must place its funding priorities where most needed.

Perhaps instead of taking "the decision to suspend regular consulate services," the Toronto consulate offices should be permanently closed. If need be, requisite necessary services could be obtained from the Embassy of Israel in Ottawa.

Sheila Friedman

Withdraw support from universities

University of Windsor is another Canadian university where students voted to boycott Israel because of its treatment of Palestinians ("Flag vandalized during BDS vote campaign," The CJN, March 6). When the Jewish state, of all countries, is singled out for denunciation, it is called, plain and simple, anti-Semitism. I have yet to hear of a boycott of China for its brutal oppression of Tibetans. Moreover, why aren't the students concerned with the human rights violations of women, workers and poor people, respectively, in these countries?

South Africa is notorious for the rapes of women and children. More than 400 Nepalese migrant workers have been, shockingly, killed on building sites in Qatar since 2010. And there is still an abominable caste system in India.

In Toronto, Jewish philanthropists have disproportionately donated to universities. My Jewish brethren should not donate to universities where it is open season on Israel. Hurt them in their pocketbooks.

Jacob Mendlovic
Toronto

Personal attacks unwarranted

Leon Kushner's denigration of former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber was as unwarranted as it was unfair ("Harper's trip to Israel," The CJN, March 20).

As a lawyer I have come to respect Mr. Farber's views and assessments of the human rights scene in Canada. As a Canadian Jew there were few professionals with the commitment and smarts who gave of their time and expertise to our community, as did Mr. Farber.

Whether it was the fight against neo-Nazism in Canada or holding politicians to account on matters of racism and bigotry Bernie Farber exemplified all that is good about the Canadian Jewish community.

While I appreciate Mr. Kushner's right to challenge anyone's ideas, I believe it behooves us always to stay away from unfair personal attacks. It's not the Jewish way.

Thornhill, Ont.

Cultural Jews are vital to Judaism

Jimmy Bitton's article ("History matters," The CJN, March 20) states that "currently, secular and purely cultural manifestations of Jewish identity are halfway houses to assimilation," citing the Pew study as proof. What the Pew study indicates is that there are many more cultural Jews than previously thought.

Bitton and others who wish to preserve Jewish identity as simply a religious, and not a cultural, phenomenon, are not only doing a disservice to the many cultural Jews who make up a vibrant part of Jewish life, but are also undercutting their own aims.

There is a paradox in Jewish life: Jews tell one another they are not Jewish or observant enough, and then they wonder why those very Jews walk away. As a rabbi in the Humanistic Jewish movement I can attest that it is only by validating and creating meaningful Jewish experiences for cultural Jews that we can avoid assimilation.

The quiet rise of the Israeli centre

Yossi Klein Halevi
Times of Israel

The burden of our generation of Jews is the fear of squandering the gift of our return to Zion. That fear helps explain the vehemence of our political and cultural debates. All our rival camps are essentially asking the same question: what is the fatal misstep that would cause us to lose this land again, this time perhaps forever?

Insufficient love of the land, responds the right. And a recurring Jewish naivete about our enemies' intentions.

Ignoring the rights of those whom we are occupying, counters the left. Denying another people the sense of home we claim for ourselves.

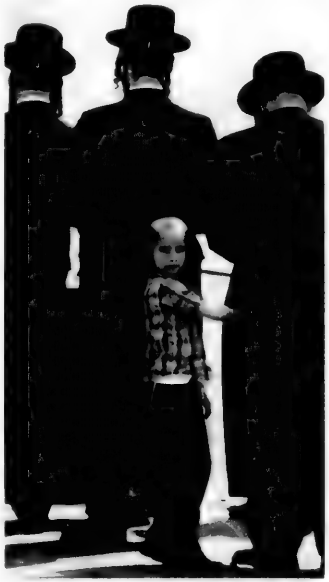
Nonsense, insist the ultra-Orthodox. The greatest threat to our continued existence in this land has nothing to do with the territories but with the level of observance of the laws of the Torah.

Each camp sees in the other not merely an ideological rival, but a potential existential threat. Perhaps the wonder isn't that our debates are so shrill but that, given what the protagonists fear is at stake and what they believe about each other, those debates aren't even more extreme.

A crucial moderating force in Israeli society has been the emergence in recent years of a political and cultural centre. Centrists view the ideological certainties of the rival camps and the existential fears directed at fellow Jews as the real danger to the long-term viability of Israeli society.

Centrists are the least understood ideological group in Israel, in part because they lack a strong political home. And yet, on the key issues of the future of the territories and of the relationship between religion and state, the centre represents a majority of Israelis.

In the four-decade-long debate between left and right over the future of the territories, the victor is – the centre. A centrist embraces insights from left and right. There is nothing ambiguous, wishy-washy, about an Israeli centrist.



A young Jewish ultra-Orthodox boy stands behind men praying after burning leavened items in a final preparation before the Passover holiday in the Beitar Illit settlement in 2010. The divide between ultra-Orthodox and the rest of Israel has replaced the religious-secular divide, Klein Halevi writes. (Flash 90 photo)

The opposite: a centrist vigorously affirms his certainties. Those just happen to be in opposition to each other.

A centrist regards a Palestinian state as an existential necessity for Israel – saving us from the impossible choice between Israel as a Jewish and a democratic state, and the moral burden of occupying another people, and from growing pariah status.

But a centrist also regards a Palestinian state as an existential threat to Israel – risking rocket attacks from the Samarian highlands on the coastal plain, where most Israelis live, transforming greater Tel Aviv into Sderot, the besieged Israeli town bordering Gaza that has been on the receiving end of thousands of rockets over the last decade.

A centrist has two nightmares about Israel's future. The first is that there won't be a Palestinian state. The second is that there will be.

This ambivalence is revealed in the polls. Some 70 per cent of Israelis consistently support a two-state solution – in principle. But that same majority doubts that, in practice, a two-state solution will grant Israel peace, because the Palestinian national movement won't accept the legitimacy of Israel even after a West Bank withdrawal.

A centrist regards with deep wariness the ideologues of left and right who dismiss the unbearable complexity of Israel's dilemmas over territory and security threats, and whose solution to any problem is always the same – either accommodation or force.

A centrist recognizes that the debate over the future of Israel's borders is so wrenching precisely because each side represents essential Jewish values and concerns.

A centrist shares with left-wingers the agonizing question: how could the Jewish People find itself as occupiers of another people? As rock musician Tomer Yosef sings in a powerful new album, Hahatzer Ha'ahorit (Backyard), produced together with veteran composer Yankeleh Rothblit, who lost a leg in the 1967 battle for Jerusalem:

The great story that begins with the Bible/ And continues to this time/ With an exiled people that returned/ Two thousand years later/ To its home between the river and the sea/ The great story of Shoah and rebirth/ Hungry pioneers redeeming the land.../ The great story has lost its way.

Yet a centrist rejects the notion that Jews are occupiers in the land of Israel. We are certainly occupiers of another people – and attempts by right-wingers to deny that reality only undermine their credibility among centrists – but we are not strangers in any part of this land. Yes, we will need to compromise with a competing national claim. But any territorial withdrawal, however necessary, will be a wound to our being, a sacrifice of cherished parts of our homeland.

A centrist believes that our ability to remain an intact people depends in large measure on recognizing the Jewish legitimacy of our competing voices. For a centrist, the debate isn't occurring so much in Israeli society as it is within himself, with left and right each compellingly arguing its case.

A similar sensibility has emerged in Israel's culture war over religion and state.

Centrists want less Judaism in official Israel, especially in legislation. And centrists want more Judaism in Israeli education and culture and in their personal lives.

This emerging cultural centre – which parallels the political centre that has formed over the future of the territories – embraces secularists, post-secularists, traditionalists and moderate religious Zionists.

For all practical purposes, there is no longer a religious-secular divide in Israel. There is, instead, a divide between the ultra-Orthodox and everyone else. The current Israeli government reflects this new reality. For the first time since 1977, ultra-Orthodox parties have been excluded from the government. And those parties were kept out by a coalition of secular and religious politicians.

Centrists are tired of Israel's internal wars. They crave a middle way between extremes – a way for Jews to honour each other's vital insights and legitimate fears, transforming the ingathering of the exiles from rival communities back into a people.

Let's be the best Jewish women we can be

I would like to express my sympathy to Norma Joseph on the passing of her mother. May she be spared any further sorrow.

Joannie Tansky in Montreal

I read with melancholy Norma Joseph's March 20 column on women and Kaddish. Before launching into my response, there are a few caveats that must be stated. Until there will be peace in the world and illness will be eradicated, as humans living by a divine Torah, there will be issues we don't like or understand. The issue of agunot is one, as is, for some, the fact Kaddish was not mandated by the sages for women.

Kaddish is bound up with praying three times daily, which puts it into the realm of "time-bound" mitzvot, which are traditionally male oriented. Given this, if a woman wants to say Kaddish there is no one stopping her. Would she be counted in a minyan in an Orthodox synagogue? No. Yet where I go to shul, there are women who do say Kaddish, quietly, along with a minyan of men. Who can say what is soothing to someone who is grieving?

As an Orthodox Jewish woman, I live my life trying to see what is right with Judaism. The title of my book, Girl Meets God: The Gift of Being a Jewish Woman, is the essence of my being. It is a privilege to be born a Jewish woman.

Given these parameters, Joseph's words didn't resonate with me. I don't dress "to the nines to combat invisibility." I'm not invisible at all. I dress in a modest, fashionable manner. Dressing modestly doesn't deny who I am as a woman, nor does it force me into hiding. Modesty extends beyond clothing into how we interact with the rest of the world. Conducting oneself with dignity is what best describes what being a modest Jewish woman is.

I have a voice, an opinion, am educated, out there and do all of these things with the constant knowledge that there is a God in the world and in His kindness, He saw fit to put me here as a Jewish woman. Therefore, I have a responsibility to make His world a better place than before I came into it.

Regarding the recitation of Kaddish, God created me as a woman and, therefore, I have a feminine role to play in His plan. The fact that I don't believe that I have to do the mitzvot that were allotted to men, either in the Torah or by the sages, is a non-issue in my life. What is an issue is to try to do the mitzvot that God and the sages did give me, as a Jewish woman, to the best of my ability.

If I choose to become a professional and work outside my home or stay home and take care of my children, I still maintain one responsibility that men were not given: to be the foundation of my home, and to teach my children, in a myriad of ways, what it means to be a Jew.

We must teach them to make this world a better place, to make a home where God's presence is felt positively, and to pass the torch to the next generation of Jews in the world.

When my own father passed away a few years ago, it was my brother who had the responsibility to say Kaddish three times a day for 11 months. The fact that I did not have to say Kaddish did not lessen my role at the time. So what did I do to honour my father's memory during the year of mourning? I did more mitzvot. I learned more. I taught other Jewish woman about their Judaism. I gave more tzedakah.

I lived my life with a renewed sense of responsibility and vigour, learning, in depth about the beauty of Judaism: morning blessings, Shabbat candles, family purity, the special mitzvah of making challah, our matriarchs, and patriarchs, and about the parshiot. There is no end to what we, as women, can learn.

Focusing on what men were given to do in terms of their Yiddishkeit is not what sustained the Jewish People for more than 5,000 years. From the women in Egypt who kept having children despite being in slavery to those who survived the Holocaust and went on to make new lives despite the horrors they endured, we have been the backbone of our people. If we had focused on the negative, on what we cannot do, we would not have survived.

Our world is not perfect yet. There is still much suffering and pain. As Jewish women, we should endeavour to be the most intelligent, learned and compassionate women we can be. It was always the Jewish woman who kept us Jewish. It was always the Jewish woman who planted the roots for the next generation.

Men, generally, are meant to deal with the present. The future – and those who will live within it – is in the hands of the women.

Where is Canadian Jewry?

Urban Writer Avrum Rosensweig

I have been writing extensively about Josef, Timea and Lulu Pusuma, a Roma Jewish family taking refuge in a Toronto church. I have done so because I feel it is our responsibility to help save them from being deported to Budapest, where they were brutally attacked by neo-Nazis, a place described by the François-Xavier Bagnoud Center for Health and Human Rights at Harvard University as full of "hate crimes, racist propaganda, discrimination and exclusionary ideologies." The centre's report calls Hungary "pre-genocidal."

The report adds there is a need for "vigorous early assessment of the risk of violence and for measures to ensure the physical and psychological safety of the Roma and other minority groups."

What is happening in Hungary is not something that can be ignored, yet much of the Toronto mainstream Jewish community is doing exactly that. Where are the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the Jewish federations and B'nai Brith on this issue? Why are March of the Living and Birthright participants not forming committees for change with members of Holocaust-related organizations and every shul, synagogue and temple in Canada as Hungary disintegrates into hate and our country deports hundreds of Roma to villages targeted by neo-Nazi styled paramilitary groups?

I challenge you to establish those committees immediately, and if you do not, explain to your donors and members why you feel so safe.

Not a single Jew should be unaware that a statue was recently erected in the centre of Budapest honouring Miklós Horthy, Hitler's boy in Hungary responsible for the murder of hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews and Roma. Every Jew needs to know that in 2013, a Hungarian political party encouraged its paramilitary wing to take control of the village Gyöngyöspata, and has called for "public order protection camps" from which the Roma will need permission to leave.

Attend an Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada hearing of a Roma family about to be deported. Hear their stories and decide how democratic and safe Hungary is for its minorities and whether it is acceptable that the Harper government is sending Roma back, en masse. Where are you?

I asked Josef and Timea Pusuma to address you. Here is what they said:

Josef: "My father was a Jew. He played in a Roma and klezmer band. We lived in a Jewish area. I am worried about the Roma and Jewish people in Hungary. They are both alien people.

"Hungarian people say, 'This country is our country. It is a white country.' I have seen many examples of anti-Semitism. It is everywhere. Hungary is not a real democracy.

"If I had the opportunity to speak to the Jewish community of Canada, I would say, 'Do not forget the Hungarian Jewish group or Hungarian Roma. If you lived in Budapest today, even one month, and you go into a store, you'll hear such things as f…ing Jews. I kill you. Go back on the trains. Adolph Hitler started one program… but not enough.'" Timea: "I was connected with the work of noted defenders of human rights. I met older people who had returned from the barracks of Birkenau. Their stories changed my life, and I wanted to help them. I took part in organizing Holocaust memorial days. I dreamt I could help establish a more just society in my own country with decent employment and wages and free education.

"It is so important Canadian Jewish group helps the Hungarian group. It is so important that Canada makes 'open door,' not just for Roma, but for Jews, too. I want to have Canadian life. Canadian people are so beautiful. I want my daughter, Lulu, to play here and play with children of so many cultures. In Hungary, my teachers said I was stupid. I was not in a normal class. Canada is my home. It is my country.

"It is very hard. We have not gone outside in 27 months. I told my daughter when we are free, we will give to you everything. It is so important that we are free already."

Please go to freelulu.ca and consider signing the petition to gain the Pusumas temporary residency and have them receive a fair hearing. We said we would!

Iranian assets ordered seized to aid terror victims

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

This Iranian-owned property at 290 Sheppard Ave. W. in Toronto will be sold to compensate victims of terrorism. [Paul Lungen photo]

An Ontario court has ordered that properties in Toronto and Ottawa owned indirectly by the government of Iran be sold to compensate several American victims of terrorism along with a Vancouver dentist.

The Superior Court of Justice also ordered two Canadian banks to transfer to the sheriff more than $2 million in cash held by agents of the Iranian government.

The estimated value of the assets comes to more than $7 million.

The court order by Judge D.M. Brown made in mid-March enforces earlier decisions by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, which had been adopted and recognized by the Nova Scotia Supreme Court.

Under the federal Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA), passed in September 2012, Canadian courts "must recognize a judgment of a foreign court" in terrorism matters if certain conditions are met. The JVTA strips countries of state immunity in cases of terrorist acts.

The American plaintiffs in the case are Edward Tracy and the family of Joseph Cicippio. Both men were captured and held hostage in Beirut by Hezbollah, an Iranian-backed terrorist organization, from 1986-91.

Tracy sued Iran and won an $18.5-million U.S. judgment in 2003. Cicippio's family won a $91-million U.S. judgment for emotional distress in 2005.

When they couldn't collect on their court awards in the United States, they looked to Canada for relief. The JVTA permitted them to do so.

The JVTA was enacted "to deter terrorism by establishing a cause of action that allows victims of terrorism to sue perpetrators of terrorism and their supporters."

Judge Brown noted that in addition to the Tracy case, the estate of Marla Bennett had approached the court to prevent the government of Iran and its Ministry of Information and Security (MIS) from selling the two Canadian properties. Bennett, from California, was killed by terrorists while visiting Jerusalem in 2002.

In addition, the court granted Sherri Wise permission to intervene in the case. Wise is a Vancouver dentist who was in Jerusalem volunteering at a dental clinic when she was injured by bombs planted by Hamas, a terrorist organization supported by Iran.

Neither Wise nor her Toronto lawyer, Mark Freiman, would comment on the case.

One of the properties ordered sold is located at 2 Robinson Ave. in Ottawa. It is valued at $3.9 million.

The other is at 290 Sheppard Ave. W., near Yonge Street. It is valued at $1.1 million.

The court found that the owner of the Ottawa property is the Mobin Foundation, whose sole director is Syed Adeli, a former Iranian ambassador to Canada.

The Toronto property is held by Farhangeiran Inc.

Judge Brown found that "the evidence overwhelmingly permits me to conclude that both properties are beneficially owned by Iran."

Although neither the Mobin Foundation nor Farhangeiran Inc. contested the case, Iran's state-run media called the decisions "politically motivated" and possessing "no legal value."

NCSY WEEKEND: NCSY (National Conference of Synagogue Youth) volunteer advisers and mentors from across North America came to the GTA March 21 to 23 for a weekend of professional development and sharing ideas. Participants spent Shabbat in Thornhill with the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto congregation and continued with a day of professional development at the Village Shul in Toronto.

GTA boy born with cystic fibrosis

Walk aims to help kids like Liam

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Whether you call it intuition or instinct, the "feeling" that mothers get when they know something is not right was what Natalie Doyle experienced throughout her second pregnancy.

"I experienced a gut feeling, a sixth sense or simply knew something without knowing how," Doyle said.

Liam Doyle, now almost two years old, was born with cystic fibrosis (CF). Both Natalie and her husband, Jamey, are carriers but didn't know it.

A child has CF when he or she inherits two defective copies of the gene responsible for the disease, one from each parent. One in 25 Canadians is a CF carrier. It's the most common fatal genetic disease in the country, affecting approximately 3,300 Canadian children and young adults. There is no cure.

Every year, thousands of Canadians from coast-to-coast lace up and join the Great Strides Walk, a family-oriented, community-supported fundraising event. This year, there will be more than 60 walk locations across Canada.

Doyle was approached to lead York Region's inaugural walk on May 25.

"We expect a minimum of 100 people coming out for the York Region walk with a target fundraising goal of $15,000. Across the country, we are looking to raise $3.3 million. Since the walk's inception in 2005, we have raised over $18.5 million," said Karen Baldwin, regional fundraising co-ordinator at Cystic Fibrosis Canada.

Liam Doyle

"It has been my therapy. I have created a Facebook page for Liam called Great Strides Walk for Liam Bear. I'm working on securing members of the York Region community to join our family, Team Bears. Our mission is to make CF stand for Cure Found," Doyle said.

CF is a multi-system disease that affects mainly the lungs and the digestive system. In the lungs, where the effects are most devastating, a build-up of thick mucus causes severe respiratory problems. Mucus and protein also build up in the digestive tract, making it difficult to digest and absorb nutrients from food.

Symptoms can include difficulty breathing, life-altering respiratory tract problems, severe, chronic lung infections, impaired growth or weight gain and extreme difficulty absorbing nutrients.

Newborn screening for CF leads to earlier treatment and thus gives children a better start in life. The median survival age for Canadians with CF is 48.5 years.

Liam's three-year-old sister, Madelynn, does not have CF, but could be a carrier.

"Statistics say there was a one in four chance for us to pass CF on to our children. A one in four chance the child will have CF. A one in four chance that they will not have any gene whatsoever and a 50 per cent chance they can be a carrier," Doyle said.

Liam's condition is explained to Madelynn through storytelling.

"Icky Sticky Booger Bugs by Sherry Frith is a book that teaches kids that you have to cough out the mucus to get it out. Madelynn helps out at home by spoon-feeding Liam his applesauce, which contains his required enzymes. Enzymes enable his body to preserve the nutrients, fats and proteins. Otherwise his pancreas doesn't function," stated Doyle.

Physiotherapy is a regular part of Liam's home care. "We tap his chest area where his lungs are for three minutes on each side, and we do this twice a day. This helps loosen some of the thick mucus where bacteria lives and breathes," Doyle said.

"Every three months we take Liam to SickKids Hospital to do a throat swab to make sure there are no bad bacteria.

"All in all, Liam is such a happy and energetic little boy – a sweet and gentle little man. My hero. I will not stop raising awareness and money until a cure or treatment is found," Doyle said.

Great Strides Walk in York Region will start at the Turtle Jacks restaurant, 11740 Yonge St. in Richmond Hill, and participants will have two 4-km walking route options from which to choose. Live music, donated coffee, muffins and bottled water will be distributed and the event will conclude with a barbecue lunch at Turtle Jacks after the walk.

TRAILBLAZING WOMEN

New Israel Fund of Canada undertook the Trailblazing Women Campaign to recognize the impact that women have on society when they lead.

With a groundswell of support and enthusiasm across Canada, people honoured the women in their lives who demonstrate strength and compassion.

They appear on our Wall of Trailblazing Women. The power of our message is reflected in the sheer size of this wall. Women's rights matter.

You lay the foundations of what we hope to achieve for women in Israel. We make it possible for women to meet their full potential.

Thank you to all who participated in this campaign.

Award-winning guitarist to perform at gala

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Music lovers are in for a treat. Grammy Award-winning guitar virtuoso Jose Feliciano will perform at the fifth annual Canadian Friends of The Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind (IGDCFB) Evening of Miracles Gala May 22 at the George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Music is a shared common language that knows no borders.

"I love Israel. I think music brings peace and goodwill," Feliciano said in a telephone interview from his Connecticut home.

Born blind and from humble beginnings in Puerto Rico, Feliciano taught himself to play guitar by listening to records and practising all day.

"At the age of three, I played percussion for my uncle on a tin cracker can, and at the age of four, I had learned the harmonica. I got a lot of enjoyment out of playing music, and as I got older, I learned to play the accordion. I was about nine years old when I became interested in the guitar. Since then, the guitar has been my life."

For more than two generations, Feliciano has bridged musical styles and influenced countless musicians. He has recorded over 45 gold and platinum records and has received 19 Grammy nominations and nine awards.

Feliciano recalled some memorable moments of his career. "In 1964, RCA Records signed a very young Feliciano, and in 1968, I won two Grammys for Light My Fire. I was on the American charts and I thought, 'Wow, I have come a long way from those hills in Puerto Rico.' And then I met my wife, Susan."

A philanthropist who has visited the guide dog centre in Israel, Feliciano strongly supports the work being done to train guide dogs for the blind and visually impaired.

"I discovered IGDCFB through a friend, Noach Braun, who is the co-founder and director. They have a very special school," he said.

The centre includes everything from spacious dog runs, whelping kennels and a veterinary clinic, to a fragrance garden and a student centre that has six bedrooms, a lounge, staff rooms, a dining room and a lecture hall. It also hosts events that allow the sighted and the sightless to interact. Privately funded through donations from around the world, the centre has helped hundreds of blind people in Israel lead independent, productive lives by giving them guide dogs free of charge.

"I have had two guide dogs in my life. The first one was a smooth-hair collie and the other was a female Doberman. As I travelled, it got complicated with quarantine laws, but that doesn't stop me from realizing how valuable they are," Feliciano said.

The IGDCFB was founded in 1991 with the goal of helping blind and visually impaired Israelis achieve independence and mobility through the use of guide dogs.

While the objective is simple, the near-miraculous work it does and the challenges it faces are complex. Compared to other countries, Israel has a disproportionately high number of blind people – more than 27,000 registered. Many have lost their sight in terrorist attacks, military action or from disease. Only about 500 of these people have a guide dog to assist them. A guide dog requires intensive professional training from birth until it leaves the centre with its partner, after a year and a half. The service life of the dog is approximately 10 years and its total cost is over $25,000.

"As part of the 2014 campaign, included in our mission is the Children's Integration Program to help blind and visually impaired children and their families. This project is implemented by Eliya, an Israeli organization that provides full-week rehabilitation programs... [for] children up to the age of six," said Canadian Friends executive director Sara Gabriel.

Feliciano celebrates Passover with family friends. "I enjoy the Jewish culture. I love Jewish food – corned beef and pastrami. My wife makes the best matzah ball soup – and she is not even Jewish."

Retired major praises Canadian Forces

Still work to do to help veterans, says Schmidt

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Retired Maj. William Hans Schmidt has nothing but praise for the Canadian Forces, in which he served for nearly 20 years. However, Schmidt says that when it comes to helping wounded or traumatized war veterans back home, Veterans Affairs Canada has a lot of work still to do.

"One hundred and fifty [Canadians] lost their lives in Afghanistan. But for every one who loses their life, 10 are wounded," Schmidt told The Canadian Jewish News. "These people served the country. The country should serve them thereafter."

Schmidt, 57, spoke to a small crowd at Branch 66 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Toronto last week at an event co-sponsored by the Temple Sinai Brotherhood, the first of several events and talks with Canadian veterans being planned, Temple Sinai program chair Joel Cadesky said.

Schmidt served in the Canadian Armed Forces from 1976 to 1995 and spent most of the early 1990s in Iraq and Kuwait. As a commander of the UN logistics force for UNIKOM (United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission), Schmidt led officers from 33 nations.

His years in the Middle East had their highs and lows. On the sunny side, Schmidt led one of Canada's major contributions to Kuwait: the re-establishment of Kuwait's hockey team. Much to the major's surprise, many Kuwaitis were passionate for the sport and even had a beautiful indoor hockey rink to play on, not far from the war zone.

On the other hand, Schmidt recalled the difficulty of getting support and money from the UN. The job became tougher when the Iraqi and Kuwaiti regimes denied killings and attacks mentioned in the major's reports.

"The United Nations is handicapped. Their hands are tied. Money is wasted," Schmidt told the Legion crowd. "The only way to assist – and I think Canada's doing it the right way – is by providing troops. It is more feasible for Canada to send in troops than it is to just throw the money out to pasture."

Although Schmidt said he wanted to be a pilot, he ended up learning about logistics when there were no pilot jobs available. Logistics is not just transporting supplies from one point to another, he explained, but preparing and planning how to get materials from their source to the soldiers who need them.

Working in logistics, he helped to build camps for British and American forces in Afghanistan. During this job, he said, he noticed how the U.S. camp was tiny and ill equipped, almost entirely unprepared to take in 12,000 marines.

Schmidt said he ended up getting the American base built by taking initiative where the U.S. contractors had not.

"Canadians, and I'm proud to say this, are the best in logistics in the whole globe," Schmidt says. "That is why the UN always asks for Canada's help. We are proven logisticians. We know how to give what is needed for the boots on the ground."

He said, however, that the efforts of Canadian soldiers are worth less without adequate funding and staffing for Veterans Affairs. His son, Jonathan, fought in Afghanistan and almost lost his life when a Taliban member shot at him with an rocket-propelled grenade – and missed by inches.

"He's doing exceptionally. He has got his mental faculties. He's the first Canadian soldier to top the U.S. army ranger course," Schmidt said of his son, who also earned a medal for his duty. "But that means nothing when all I hear is that nothing's being done for the soldiers back here suffering, physically and psychologically."

Schmidt retired in 1995, before he was even 40. Although he said he thought he would stay in the Forces for 35 years, he said he got scared that serving for that long would ruin him. He decided to try doing logistics in the civilian world.

Today, Schmidt works in logistics for automotive tech company Mevotech in Toronto. He says he can't see himself retiring.

500 students vote to endorse boycott against Israel

Hillel urges McMaster to reject BDS vote

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — McMaster University Hillel representatives are expecting the university to reject a resolution calling for boycotts, divestments and sanctions against Israel.

At a McMaster Students Union general assembly meeting March 26, about 500 students voted to endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel, which calls for action against businesses with ties to Israel, due the country's policies regarding the Palestinian territories.

The motion came just as the undergraduate student group had to vacate the gym where the meeting was being held, leaving little time for debate. The vote happened after the meeting was scheduled to end, and the assembly did not have quorum, which would have been 633 students. This makes it a non-binding resolution. It will now go before the Student Representative Assembly, the MSU's governing council.

"This resolution has neither democratic legitimacy nor popular support at McMaster. If anything, it makes a mockery of the processes and mandate of the MSU, which exists to unite all students and advocate for student causes, rather than import divisive foreign conflicts onto campus," said Raphael Szajnfarber, director of Jewish Student Life, McMaster University Hillel. "We fully expect the SRA to reject this vote."

On its Facebook page, the Say Yes to BDS-McMaster campaign says it will take action to make the motion binding.

"A boycott of Israelis does nothing to promote a peace that benefits both Israelis and Palestinians, Szajnfarber said. "In contrast, it's simply a modern-day blacklist and discrimination on the basis of national origin. To implement this resolution would almost certainly violate the university's anti-discrimination policy."

Avi Benlolo

Szajnfarber called the general assembly meeting a "toxic and tense environment." In fact, some BDS opponents left as a group and one student at the microphone asked security to stand between him and another student.

"The tension was palpable. It was the build-up of a week of escalating rhetoric and the culmination of a divisive campaign" Szajnfarber said.

"We support free speech and debate and people thinking critically about an important foreign policy issue. People should be talking about these issues in university," he added. "But a unilateral campaign designed to shut down debate is not the way to go about it."

Salah Khalaf, a chemical engineering student, had asked that BDS be debated at the meeting. He told the CBC the campaign "does not target any ethnicity race or religion, rather any corporation that helps sustain the illegal occupation."

He sees universities as the place to have these conversations.

"In every academic institution since civilized man has existed, we have had discussion and debate," he said.

York University students voted in favour of BDS last year. Last month, University of Windsor students voted for it, but those results are under investigation.

Following the McMaster vote, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) called on McMaster president Patrick Deane to safeguard Jewish students on campus.

"The Jewish community is fed up with this discriminatory targeting of Israel, which is nothing more than the latest trend in anti-Semitism," said FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo.

"Until these students wake up to the slaughter that is happening in Syria, or notice the naked Russian aggression against the Ukraine, or take a stand on attacks against Jews in France, their concern for human rights is revealed for what it is: outright hatred and hostility against Jews. It is time for president Deane to take his own stand and protect the rights of all of his students, and not just those who shout the loudest.

In an email to The CJN, Deane stressed that the student union is a separate entity from the university and that because there was no quorum, the motion isn't binding on the MSU anyway.

"The university is guided by foundational principles of freedom of speech and expression in an inclusive and respectful environment," Deane said. "We work to ensure students and other members of the community feel safe to express their opinions in an environment of tolerance and respect. There are a number of ways we work together to achieve this."

Guest Voice

Hosting an Israeli hero

Terri Sugar Keyfitz
Special to The CJN

When my husband and I hosted an injured Israeli hero in our home, we had no idea what to expect. It turned out that we had an immensely rewarding experience and a fabulous time!

Beit Halochem Canada, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel is an amazing organization that was founded in 1978 and is devoted to helping rehabilitate the more than 50,000 disabled Israeli veterans and victims of terror.

After the injured leave the hospital, they go to state-of-the-art Beit Halochem centres in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Nahariya or Be'er Sheva. These centres boast an array of rehabilitative services including physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, therapeutic devices, specialized sports equipment and training, family-oriented programming, and creative and cultural activities.

Beit Halochem is committed to increasing community awareness and ties to Israel through group visits of disabled Israeli veterans to the Toronto, Ottawa, Calgary, Vancouver and Montreal Jewish communities. Every June, Beit Halochem Canada hosts a group of 10 veterans for two weeks. Ten families open their homes as hosts, and another 10 are co-hosts to the visitors. The heroes come from all over Israel, are of various ages, had different roles in the Defence Forces and have varying injuries. They are all mobile enough to walk up stairs, get on and off a bus, and their injuries are not readily apparent.

At our very first encounter with our Beit Halochem guests, I was really surprised to see how moved with emotion and appreciation they were.

What I came to understand was that they had not expected strangers in the Diaspora – in a world that seems to them to be entirely against Israel – to really care about Israeli people.

Also, they come from a country where being an injured war veteran is, sadly, not unique, and they were touched to know that we were extremely sympathetic to each and every one of them.

I really enjoyed becoming acquainted with these 10 interesting individuals during the many fun-filled activities and events that are part of the Beit Halochem group visit.

At the parties, we danced and ate and laughed, and then one of the vets would get up and tell his personal story – and we shed many tears.

Some of them had never before been able to speak about their war experiences, but gradually opened up during their stay with us. In this relaxed, pressure-free atmosphere, they blossomed like flowers. It was heartening to see.

They became like family to us. It was quite funny to hear vets of all ages call their hosts and co-hosts "Mom" and "Dad," whether they were younger or older than us!

What was most special was getting to know our own new "family member" during intimate talks in our kitchen. Our new "son" entered our home, our lives and our hearts.

These Israel Defence Forces men are true heroes. They literally put their lives on the line to protect our beloved Israel. Hosting them is our small way of giving back.

When these heroes spoke of their appreciation to us, we responded that we are the ones to be grateful.

Hosting a disabled Israeli veteran for Beit Halochem was truly an enriching experience.

If a family in the community would like to be a host or a co-host, please contact the Beit Halochem office at 905-695-0611 or beithalochem.ca.

Probe validates group's concerns

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR — A University of Windsor investigation has found serious irregularities with the way a recent boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) referendum was carried out, validating complaints by Jewish students on campus.

The March 2 referendum, sponsored by the Palestinian Solidarity Group, the first such vote among undergraduate students at a Canadian university, passed 798 to 585 amid widespread complaints of abuse of process. University president Alan Wildeman ordered the investigation by Toronto lawyer and former human rights commissioner Raj Anand.

Of five major complaints, "all have been substantiated," Wildeman said in a letter to students.

One was that there were not enough signatures on the petition to hold the referendum – "at most 404" when 500 were required. Changes in the structure of the student council executive were also in violation of its constitution, resulting in participation by individuals "not entitled" to take part in meetings and votes.

The motion to hold the referendum "occurred without legitimate quorum and involved votes cast by non-members." And the referendum question itself was "unclear and ambiguous" containing several questions rather than one, therefore in non-compliance with bylaws.

Wildeman said he would discuss "possible next steps" to help "achieve effective student governance."

The Jewish Students Association applauded the findings calling them a "validation" of the group's concerns.

In addition, Hillel Ontario executive director Donald Sylvan said "this is not the first time we have seen undemocratic tactics by BDS activists on campus."

Palestinian Solidarity Group spokesman Mohammed Almoayad said he wasn't surprised by the letter. "This has been the goal of the administration all alone," he told the Windsor Star.

Received permission to rent space

Off-campus group holds IAW at U of M

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Last year, first-year University of Manitoba law student Josh Morry successfully petitioned the University of Manitoba Students' Union (UMSU) to strip funding and official club status from Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), the group that organized Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) at the school, on the grounds that it was making Jewish students on campus feel uncomfortable.

That seemed to be the end of IAW at U of M. It turned out, however, that it was merely a setback for anti-Israel forces on campus.

Undeterred, an off-campus group, Winnipeg Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid (WCAIA), went over the head of UMSU this year and appealed directly to U of M president David Barnard for permission to rent space at the university for the tenth annual IAW.

To the consternation of Morry and others on campus, Barnard gave his approval.

Morry and some 40 other students sent a letter to Barnard in mid-March protesting the decision. "As Jewish and non-Jewish members of the Jewish Students Association at the U of M and [University of Winnipeg], we are very concerned and disappointed with the university's decision," they wrote.

"It is simply not safe to be labelled a racist and apartheid supporter on campus, as students at Concordia [University] and York University have found out the hard way. Following UMSU's decision to ban SAIA and IAW, members of the anti-Israel community proceeded to post Holocaust jokes on the UMSU Facebook page. Some of these people are members of CAIA," the letter added.

They noted that U of M's "Respectful Work and Learning Environment Policy" states that "the university does not condone any behaviour that is 'likely' to undermine the dignity or self-esteem of students" and the university "has an obligation to uphold its policies," they said.

"We are students paying to attend university, and we have the right to a safe learning environment free from groups that undermine our dignity and self-esteem. It is shocking to us that the University of Manitoba is prepared to disregard its own policies and jump through hoops to allow an off-campus advocacy group to poison the atmosphere of the university at the expense of its students. We can't help but ask ourselves why our university is colluding with those who hurt us."

Josh Morry

The letter concluded: "Our goal is simply to learn in a safe environment, please respect us by enforcing your policies."

Morry said the UMSU executive also met with Barnard about the issue. "Dr. Barnard assured them that the decision does not put students at risk nor undermine UMSU's decision," he said.

"Dr. Barnard has decided that the rights of an off-campus group overshadows the rights of paying students."

Leah Janzen, the university's associate vice-president of outreach and engagement, said U of M routinely licenses space to off-campus individuals and organizations, as long they respect the law and university policies.

In his written response to the students' letter, Barnard said much the same thing. He also noted that "the Human Rights Code obligates [the university] not to discriminate against groups based upon their political beliefs. We simply attempt to ensure that those beliefs are expressed in a respectful way that furthers our mission to facilitate informed debate."

Morry said that while the WCAIA was initially given space on the fifth floor of the UMSU building, the group was eventually allowed to have a booth on the main floor, where it had much greater visibility.

The group held its anti-Israel programs during the week of March 17 to 21 and featured an attack on SodaStream and an appearance by John Greyson, an anti-Israel filmmaker from Toronto who was arrested last year at the Egypt-Gaza border while trying to enter Gaza and was imprisoned in Egypt for a period of time.

Morry said the IAW programs seemed to have been poorly attended, but he expressed concern that ill-informed students may have been swayed by the propaganda.

CIJA calls fraud 'revolting'

Scam letter preys on Holocaust survivors

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is alerting Holocaust survivors and their families not to be taken in by an "odious" scam that promises to unlock Swiss bank accounts in exchange for personal information.

CIJA became aware of a letter campaign that appears to be targeting the Jewish community and which in one case advised a Calgary resident that one of their relatives killed during the Holocaust had left $75 million in a Swiss bank account. The letter bears the name of a consulting firm and a New York address and phone number.

Sara Saber-Freedman

Sara Saber-Freedman, executive vice-president of CIJA, said she contacted the letter writer by phone, but when she refused to turn over her cellphone number, he immediately hung up on her.

In the letter, copies of which were sent to others in Canada, the writer claims he is able to access the funds if the recipient of the letter provides extensive personal information.

Saber-Freedman said, "It's exactly like every other one of those [411] scams that you read about and you get by email all the time. I understand that Nigeria is the source of a lot of this type of fraud."

While frauds of this nature prey on people's trusting nature, this particular fraud "is revolting," she said. "To use the Holocaust in this context is just vile."

Survivors are elderly and can be vulnerable to this sort of pitch, she added.

Sidney Zoltak, co-president of the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors and Descendants, said similar "sick kinds of operations" have come up before, promising survivors they could recover funds on insurance policies and properties in Poland.

He advised survivors and their families to pursue claims through reputable organizations.

Zoltak said that while the current letter campaign did not ask for money up front, "this is the beginning. Once you get to speak to someone who is really smooth, they can talk you into a lot of things."

They prey on the vulnerable and they're ready "to take away their last savings and leave them penniless.

"They don't care as long as they score," he said.

Saber-Freedman said she had informed U.S. law enforcement authorities and the Canadian Anti-Fraud Centre, a government agency, about the letters.

Quebec students weigh in on elections

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One will be casting her ballot for the first time.

Another is determined to stay in Quebec even if it separates from Canada.

But for four Jewish student voters 11 days before a pivotal provincial election, there was still a lot more consensus than conflict during a CJN interview at the venerable Hillel House on Stanley Street.

Not surprisingly, Denise Felsztein, 18, Zack Goldig, 24, Meagan Reinish, 22, and Jeremy Elbaz, 22 were all pro-federalist and intend to vote that way on April 7.

But they also sensed that there's a lot more at stake than usual in this election.

All live with their families in safe Liberal ridings.

The students cringed at the idea of a referendum on sovereignty and, like many Quebec voters, complained that the election campaign hasn't focused on the issues that really count: jobs, the economy, health care and tuition fees.

The students were also in agreement in characterizing the proposed secular values charter as chilling – even scary – in its potential ramifications for religious minorities.

It's racist and illegal, they said, and panders to intolerance by exploiting anti-Muslim and anti-religious minority sentiment among the Franco-Québécois population, with the worst-case scenario being a Parti-Québécois majority eventually passing the charter – Bill 60 – into law.

If that were to happen, all but Elbaz said they would have to consider making their lives and careers elsewhere.

"I would definitely go," said Goldig, a law student at the Université de Montréal, while Reinish, a social work student at McGill University, said she would also consider leaving since there's "so much racism" in the charter.

While Felsztein, a commerce student at Dawson College and a first-time voter, expressed the wish to stay in Quebec, she was undecided about what she would do.

But not Elbaz, a Concordia University political science student who said he would stay no matter what and "fight for my rights here."

Elbaz said the reaction is "split" when people learn he would stay if Quebec separated, "but I don't want to be perceived as running away from it," he said.

"Why would I want to? I'm an integrated Quebecer."

Tellingly, on the day of the interview – March 26 – there were more reasons for the students to feel encouraged than at the start of the election campaign – at least according to the polls released that day.

They were also grateful to Quebecor head Pierre Karl Péladeau for entering the race and turning what looked like a possible Parti Québécois majority into a possible Liberal majority, all because he had focused on holding another sovereignty referendum in his acceptance speech.

According to the polls, that's something a large majority of Quebecers don't want.

News of the PQ's troubles came as heartening not only to the students, but also to the larger Jewish community, even though Quebec voters are known to be fickle and the tide could swing again by election day.

Elbaz and Reinish noted that the charter appeared to be in line with the policy in France to establish a strict secular approach to state-society relations, but they said it was untenable nonetheless.

Reinish said it would have been much more acceptable for the government to establish "religious accommodation" principles using the guidelines recommended by the Bouchard-Taylor commission, whose report was largely ignored.

If the values charter eventually passes, she said, it might only be a matter of time before it's also adopted by the private sector and affect not only public workers in regard to banning the wearing of religious articles, but everyone.

Like other voters, the students wished that they had a pro-federalist mainstream party to vote for.

This being the first election Felsztyn is voting in, she's paying closer attention than previously, but said she has always been aware of Quebec politics.

Elbaz, who is voting for the second time in 18 months, said he been following politics more over the last few years.

Politics always seemed to interest Reinish, who has volunteered for the campaign of Liberal Leader Philippe Couillard as well as politically within the Jewish community.

Goldig, for his part, said he didn't realize until recently how political he was.

All but Goldig had the opportunity to watch the first election debate, and all seemed most impressed by the forthrightness and articulateness of Québec solidaire leader Françoise David.

"I wish she was a federalist," Elbaz said.

Couple hopes to raise awareness of breast cancer

As a way to celebrate and give back to the community, the couple organized Kol Isha: The Female Voice, a concert to raise money and awareness for cancer research and the BRCA gene mutation, which is associated with an increased risk of breast cancer. BRCA-1 and 2 are more common in Ashkenazi Jews than in other groups. Though she wasn't aware of it before her diagnosis, Lieberman had the BRCA-1 gene.

At the concert, guests were given free genetic testing kits for the gene. Money raised went to the Women's College Research Institute, directed by Dr. Steven Narod. The event, which took place at Beth Sholom Synagogue on March 27, was hosted by Dr. Marla Shapiro, of Dr. Marla and Friends, and included performers Amy Sky, Neshama Carlebach and Magda Fishman.

Moses hopes the event leads to a push for women to get genetic testing for the BRCA gene.

"The good thing about testing now, if you have information in advance, you can truly save your life. You can stop yourself from getting cancer," he said.

He also hopes it gives others battling cancer hope.

"Not everybody has the same outcome we do, and we recognize that. Having said that, there are many that do come out to a positive end and we have to celebrate every moment we have," he said. "It certainly gives you a new perspective on life when you get challenged like this. You learn to really live every day as if it's your last."

Joe Lebovic reflects on a life of philanthropy

There's no slowing down Toronto developer

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Joe and Wolf Lebovic are builders and land developers who are as well known for their philanthropic endeavours as their business projects. The Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in York Region, for one, has become a hub for the Jewish community in the northern GTA. The brothers have given millions to a variety of charities. Joe Lebovic is recipient of numerous honours, including the Canada Medal, though the Order of Canada has till now eluded him. Last weekend, Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University awarded the brothers honorary doctorates. The CJN recently interviewed Joe Lebovic in his Stouffville office.

You were born in Czechoslovakia before the war. Were you a yeshiva bocher back then?

Before the war, no I didn't go to the yeshiva until such time as I went to England. So when we left Czechoslovakia, I went to Hungary and from Hungary I went to England. In England I went to the yeshiva for one year in Sunderland and for over two years I went to Etz Chaim yeshiva.

How did your family survive the Holocaust?

We survived in Budapest by using false papers. The underground gave us papers saying we were Christian, that my grandmother was Christian. And that worked to a certain extent, but if the police or anybody got suspicious that your papers were not truthful, they made you drop your pants and if they found you were circumcised, you got hung up on the closest tree on the street. So when you walked in Budapest, you could see Jews hanging from trees, all those Jews who got caught with false papers.

I read you hope to live until you're 120. Is there more in your life you want to accomplish before then?

We're still working, we have more projects going than ever. We're making money and 75 per cent of what we make goes to charity.

We're adding value to people who are buying homes. We are creating more housing. And whatever the profits we're making goes to charity.

My brother's kids are already looked after. I don't have kids, so whatever is left over, all goes to charity.

Many people your age retire. Is that something you've ever considered?

No. I would retire tomorrow if I could find something more exciting to do than what I'm doing. Or more productive.

Your involvement in charitable causes is well known. Was there something in the way you were raised that leads you to give so much of what you earn to charity?

For us to give is very easy. It's in our genes. My great-grandfather was a big giver, relative to what he had. My grandfather was a big giver. My father was a big giver to charity. So to us it comes automatically. It's very easy.

Tell us why you were honoured by Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University.

Yeshiva University came to me saying we want to honour you and your brother. But the yeshiva does not offer us this honour because we gave them money. I think we've given to the yeshiva maybe $100,000 altogether. But when the president [of the yeshiva] came to talk to me, he said 'we're honouring you for what you have done in Toronto and for other charities, not for what you've done for the yeshiva.'

Is Jewish education as a charitable recipient important to you?

The whole Jewish religion is based on Jewish sustainability. To have sustainability the children have to understand what their religion, what Judaism, is all about. Whether it's religious education or education about Jewish history, what Jews have accomplished. That will make them proud of what they are, who they are. Also, the people who have a Jewish education enjoy a more comfortable family life and have a more fulfilling life by practicing the Jewish tradition.

Years ago, your family got into the land development business. How did you get into that line of work?

It was an evolutionary thing. Originally, my grandfather and my father were in the lumber and timber business. Through evolution we went from manufacturing lumber into the lumber wholesale business. From wholesale we went into the retail business. We were selling lumber to builders. Then we decided we might as well start building ourselves.

When you build houses, you have to buy building lots. You buy building lots from the developers. Developers are making more money than builders, so we started buying land and we became land developers. Now we are doing everything, building and land development.

Was it easier to get into the business in the 1950s than it is today?

If you consider that we had to borrow money at 24 per cent, plus two per cent legal fees, plus two per cent finance fees, I wouldn't say it was easy, because we didn't have much money. We had to hypothecate (pledge as security) the trucks to buy land. We gambled and we bought land and we survived. We had a few recessions and we managed to protect what we bought. We had 13 foreclosures and special endorsements from the banks but we somehow managed to struggle through and we survived.

What are the biggest differences today from the early days in completing a project?

The biggest problem is bureaucracy. To develop a piece of land, we have to go in excess of 160 procedures and if you manage to get a piece of land developed within 10 years, you're doing good.

You have to get approvals at every level of government. It's very easy for government people to say 'no,' because once they say 'no,' they haven't made a mistake. So there's no incentive for any level of government to give approval. And [the cost of] lots are so high because there are a shortage of building lots, because it takes that long to produce something.

You've given millions in charity. Are you satisfied with the way the money has been spent?

We have given unrestricted money. In a way, it's a mistake. But certain institutions will only accept, like the Federation itself will not accept restricted money. Once it's not restricted money, there is no way you can supervise as to where your money goes. It's controlled by the board and the board is controlled by staff, and not the other way around.

The same thing occurred when we gave $50 million to the Mount Sinai Hospital. We specified as to what should happen, but there was no written agreement. We told them what we wanted, but since it was unrestricted money, they did whatever they wanted and they did not do what we expected them to do.

I'm not saying they did the wrong thing. The work they're doing is exemplary. But it wasn't exactly what I wanted.

Are you planning to give away most of what you've made?

We give away most. Right now I have more problems deciding where it should go than how to make it. Today, we got to a point where people have more money to give than people who need it come up with a proper project with how to get it. Especially Jewish institutions.

The problem in Canada is not as bad as in the United States, where of the billions of dollars Jews are giving to charity, only 14 per cent goes to Jewish causes.

And it's going to get worse and worse, because my generation is more giving than the next generation. So I recommend that people making up their wills should make up foundations and designate now where their money should go.

Daniel Gordis
Author explores life of Menachem Begin

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Award-winning author and lecturer Daniel Gordis was in Toronto last week to promote his new book, a biography about Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, one of Israel's most controversial figures.

As a regular columnist for the Jerusalem Post, contributor to the New York Times, among other publications, Gordis, who made aliyah from New York to Israel in 1998, is regarded as an authority on Israeli current events.

In an interview with The CJN about his first biography and his latest release, Menachem Begin: The Battle for Israel's Soul, Gordis talked about the contradictions that made Begin so compelling and why there hasn't been an Israeli leader like him since.

Was there anything you learned about him through your research that surprised you?

I didn't really know a lot getting started... but I would say the main take away was the way in which – what for some people would seem to be contradictions – were commitments that Begin comfortably lived with side by side.

Before the state, when Begin lived underground, he was obviously committed to using violence to getting the British to leave. On the other hand, as soon as he saw that there was a chance to make peace with [Egyptian president Anwar Sadat], he became a peacemaker. He was deeply committed to the Jewish People and his whole life was about Jewish peoplehood and the Jewish People's right to the land and so on and so forth, and yet he was also deeply committed to a universalistic look at humankind.

He was committed to the Vietnamese boat people, and the Evangelicals loved him because of how he treated Christians in Israel. He was the one who actually advocated ending military rule over Israel's Arab population and it was ended because of his endorsement of that.

He was a person of violence when he needed to be, but he was also a person that made great strides towards peace. He was a person who was very, very public. He was one of Israel's greatest orators, if not the greatest orator that Israel ever had and yet at the same time, he ended his life really in hiding.

There were a lot of contradictions... Too many of us think about the world in black and white terms. We imagine ourselves being on the right or being on the left. We imagine ourselves being a person for Jewish peoplehood or caring about the world. Either this or that. And I don't think Begin was not an either/or guy. He was a both/and guy. He was a person who cared about all of these things at the same time. I think it's an important wake up call for all of us regardless of where we are on the political spectrum.

Was there anything about Begin's philosophy or political approach that you think Israeli leaders today should adopt?

I would say that one of the things that distinguishes Begin almost from everybody else that Israel has had as prime minister is that Begin saw the world through a biblical set of lenses. He didn't really see Israel as a new phenomenon. He saw Israel as a rebirth of a biblical model of Jewish life. He was returning us to a place where we had been.

He was a person of great passion but also a pragmatist. I think Israel has politicians who are great pragmatists and [Israel] has some very passionate people. But it has very few people who combine great passions with real pragmatism. You would not have guessed that Begin, in hiding from the British and being complicit in the blowing up of the King David hotel, would be the guy who would give Sinai back to Anwar Sadat. And you wouldn't imagine that the guy who got the Nobel Peace Prize would be the guy who would successfully attack the Osirak nuclear reactor [in Iraq] and you wouldn't suspect that the guy who successfully attacked the Osirak nuclear reactor would launch a completely failed war in Lebanon.

Life is messy. Life is not conducted in the pristine conditions of a laboratory and Begin understood that in a way that too many Israeli politicians simply are not willing to accept.

Are there any political leaders today that remind you of Begin?

I don't think Begin really has any great heirs, which is actually very sad, because he was perhaps one of the greatest leaders that Israel ever had.

Writing this book, I've interviewed dozens and dozens of people. I would say that a good number of them looked me right in the eye and said, unquestionably, Begin was the greatest Jewish leader since King David. Whether they were right or wrong is completely irrelevant. The point is that such intelligent people say that in all seriousness.... I think the reason he has no heirs, ironically, is because if you think about it, to the left, he was an anathema because of his history of violence with the British and because he invaded Lebanon and all those things. To the right, he's an anathema because he gave back the Sinai, he gave back land.

I think he did both of those things because, like great pragmatists, different periods of time call for different strategies and different tactics and a willingness to be either very hardnosed or compromising. It's kind of sad that no one has adopted his combination of ideology and passion.

Our generations are inheritors of a Zionist narrative that was basically fashioned by [former prime minister David] Ben-Gurion and his disciples. It was the Labor party, the Mapai party, the Israeli political left that was in charge for so many years, that really shaped the conception of how Israeli history unfolded and I think an examination of Begin's life is an opportunity to look into that history and ask ourselves some questions about it.

Daniel Gordis

Even though Ben-Gurion and Begin were kind of archenemies, arch rivals and nemeses for all those years, the truth is, we wouldn't have a Jewish state if it wasn't for David Ben-Gurion, and we would not have a state if it were not for Menachem Begin. I think that is a reminder for all of us that even if we have a certain space on the spectrum that we occupy, whether it's left, right, or whatever the case may be... the reality is we wouldn't have a state to be having a conversation about if it wasn't for both Begin and Ben-Gurion. There is something very humbling about that reminder that these two people who were archenemies were actually both absolutely necessary. If we could see each other today, even when we disagree as competitors, that both are desperately needed for the future of the Jewish state, I think we'd be in much better shape.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Syria's an archeological treasure trove

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

Syria has been in the news because of its violent civil war. Recently, it has been reported that some of its wonderful archeological sites have been damaged in the ferocious fighting that has torn the country apart.

Syria is the jewel in the crown of biblical archeology. Ancient Israel features prominently in this column, but it's a poor relation compared to the lavish and grandiose treasure trove of sites that have been found in Syria.

The highpoint of archeological discoveries in Syria occurred in the interwar years, when Syria was part of the Mandate countries created from the breakup of the Ottoman Empire. As most of us know, Britain took Palestine while the French obtained Syria. Archeologically, the French got a much better deal. A number of spectacular discoveries were made during this time.

One of the first sites to be discovered was ancient Ugarit, the modern Ras Shamra, found accidentally on the Syrian coast opposite Cyprus by a peasant plowing his field in 1928. Within a short time, the site produced a new alphabetic script and a large palace. It turned out to be a bonanza for biblical scholars, who would use it for insights into obscure passages of biblical Hebrew, especially in such works as Psalms and the Book of Job.

Ugarit was dated to the Late Bronze Age, in the latter half of the second millennium BCE. It proved to be the link that tied the major maritime civilizations of the eastern Mediterranean together, including Egypt, the Mycenaeans and the Hittites. The great American Egyptologist, James Henry Breasted, referred to this period as the "first international age."

Further inland, the French discovered the site of Mari on the bend of the Euphrates River as it turned south toward Iraq. It turned out that Mari had been destroyed by the legendary Babylonian king Hammurabi around 1750 BCE. Archeologists found a palace with thousands of cuneiform tablets, some of which mentioned sites such as Hazor that were located in Canaan before it became ancient Israel.

Also on the Upper Euphrates, but dating some 2,000 years later, to the third century CE, is the site of Dura Europus. Its discovery reads like the plot in an old Hollywood movie. Right after World War I, a British expedition fighting an Arab revolt in upper Mesopotamia discovered magnificent wall paintings in a building that had just been uncovered by a desert sandstorm. They belonged to a Roman outpost that had been abandoned and covered up by desert sands. Subsequent excavations turned up a synagogue dating from the third century CE that was exceptionally well preserved. An Aramaic inscription gave an exact date for the building of 244 CE. It has been a major contributor to our knowledge of the evolution of synagogues. It was later moved to Yale University, where it can still be seen in all of its magnificence. Sadly, one cannot say the same for the rest of this amazing site.

NCSY marks 60th anniversary

CJN Staff

One Shabbat, eight shuls, six dynamic speakers. NCSY Toronto celebrates 60 years with a citywide pre-Pesach Shabbat April 4 and 5.

After so many years of bringing the community and alumni together, NCSY, the youth movement of the Orthodox Union, welcomes these dynamic OU speakers to the Greater Toronto Area: Steven Savitsky, chairman of the board; Rabbi Steven Weil, executive vice-president; Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb, executive vice-president emeritus; NextGen director Rabbi David Felsenthal; director of education of NCSY international, Rabbi Dovid Bashevkin; and Rabbi Israel Lashak, director of NCSY Southwest region.

The speakers will speak about the unity and collective responsibility of the Jewish People as we approach the festival of Pesach, when we celebrate our liberation and freedom.

On Saturday night, April 5, at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation at 9:30 p.m., speakers will address the challenges facing the Jewish People in the next generation, followed by a traditional NCSY kumzitz with special musical guests. The entire community and NCSY alumni in particular are invited to attend.

"We haven't done anything like this before," said Rabbi Glenn Black, chief executive officer of NCSY Canada. "We are excited to bring such a talented group of speakers to the city, to say thank you to our many supporters and to recognize the thousands of NCSY alumni throughout the city. We can all use some inspiration."

Rabbi Black pointed out that recent surveys showed NCSY's work is more relevant than ever.

"The Pew report released last fall that painted a bleak picture of Jewish Identity was an eye opener for some, but we have known for a long time that the struggle to maintain Jewish identity and connection to Israel in the next generation is only getting tougher. We at NCSY have never been more prepared for the challenge."

NCSY Canada is dedicated to ensuring the future of the Jewish People by building relationships with Jewish teens, increasing Jewish literacy by teaching them about their heritage and traditions, establishing lifelong connections to Am Yisrael and Eretz Yisrael and enhancing their growth in Judaism.

Rabbi Glenn Black

"We're looking forward to meeting old friends we haven't seen for a long time," said NCSY alumna and committee member Amy Stopnicki. "Most alumni, from the 1960s to now, will tell you that their best NCSY memories were post-Shabbat havdalahs and kumzitzes."

What does freedom really mean?

Rabbi Aaron Levy

Rabbinic Reflections

Many of us are quite busy preparing our kitchens for Passover, which is only a week and a half away! But how do we prepare ourselves intellectually, emotionally and spiritually for this most central Jewish holiday, the foundation of our religious history, ethics and peoplehood?

Reflecting on the themes of Passover is crucial for making our seder experience meaningful, the locus of lively and participatory discussion probing the Exodus story. I'd like to suggest that we contemplate the most basic motif of Passover, encapsulated in the rabbinic name for the holiday, zman cheiruteinu, the season of our freedom.

What is freedom? Let's explore four of its meanings through Jewish sources.

The prophet Isaiah speaks of physical freedom: "The Eternal has sent me… to proclaim liberty to the captives, freedom to the imprisoned" (61:1). And while the Torah doesn't use the word freedom in reference to the liberation from Egyptian slavery, this is, of course, the prime example of bodily freedom in Judaism.

After six years of indentured servitude working off a debt, a servant's master must set her or him free (Deuteronomy 15:12-15). As well, the Torah commands: "Do not let him go empty-handed: Furnish him out of the flock, threshing floor, and vat." Economic independence is a freedom that isn't complete until a person is enabled to be financially stable and self-sufficient. Similarly, the communal jubilee (50th) year marked the re-distribution of land to its original Israelite owners, ensuring that the principal form of wealth in an agrarian society wouldn't be absolutely lost or overly accumulated. As Leviticus (25:8-10) states, "You shall proclaim liberty throughout the land for all its inhabitants."

Although on the surface, Adam and Eve's eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil is a sin, we can also see this act as the turning point in Genesis' presentation of humanity's maturation to free will, including the ability to think for ourselves, question, and disobey God.

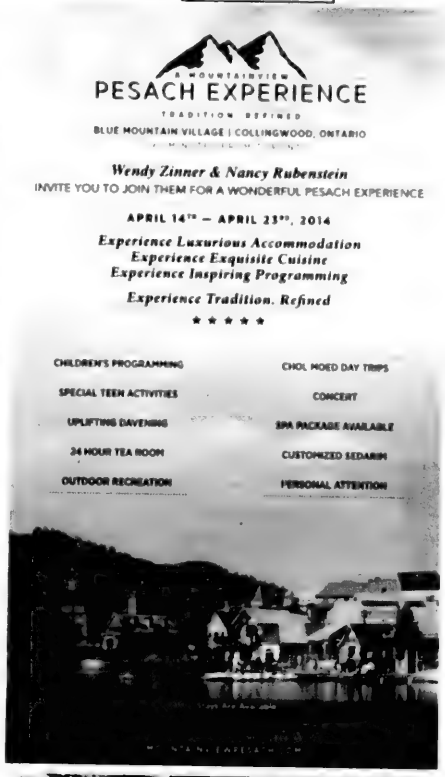
The Mishnah (Avot 6:2) asserts: "No one is free except one who is occupied in Torah study." Commenting on the Haggadah, the contemporary French-Jewish philosopher Marc-Alain Ouaknin furthers this theme: "It is a paradox of liberty that it can only be attained within the framework of order, of rules, of words and symbols of extraordinary precision." Spiritual freedom is achieved through learning structure and choosing restraint.

These texts suggest concepts of physical, financial, intellectual and spiritual freedoms. Celebrating Passover involves re-enacting and internalizing our history through eating and drinking, questioning and learning, singing and searching. So it's vital that we also ask ourselves and each other more personal questions: What does freedom mean to me? How am I free? In what ways am I enslaved? How can I move toward greater freedom?

Let's also remember that so many people around the world and here in Canada lack the freedoms that Judaism and we hold dear. I invite you to consider: what concrete deeds can I do to help others become free, able to proclaim more fully their liberty? Taking action on these ideas is holy work that embodies the meaning of Passover.

May we each deepen our understandings and expand our applications of this season of our freedom. Have a happy and liberating Pesach!

Rabbi Aaron Levy is founder and executive director of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism in Toronto.



Judaism's timelessness anchors us

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

I am intrigued by commercials for medications that list all of the potential side effects, which can range from minor hiccups (literally) to rather consequential results, such as stroke, heart failure or death. It would not encourage me to purchase the latest decongestant knowing that I could pass away while taking advantage of my newly cleared nasal passages.

How we sell a product has relevance in the Jewish realm as well. When a non-Jew approaches us to convert to Judaism, we are enjoined by the Talmud to tell him or her that the Jewish people are "persecuted, oppressed, despised and harassed, and suffering afflictions" – not exactly an enticing invitation to become Jewish. We understand the reluctance of our sages to be proactive in seeking converts – we want people to join us for the right reasons, and we don't feel that everybody has to be Jewish in order to live a good and noble life and to inherit eternal reward. But are we doing enough internally and externally to convey the positive message of Jewish life and Jewish practice?

I would love to see full-page ads in our print and digital media featuring lines such as, "It's great to be a Jew!" "Kosher is cool" "Have you kissed your mezuzah today?" "It's eight o'clock: do you know where your tfillin are?" With the noteworthy exception of Chabad, few of us are sufficiently outspoken about the joys of Judaism.

Yes, Judaism is a great religion, but if one looks at our typical Jewish family, one could say, "Could have fooled me." For if Judaism is so great, why are so many Jews so unenthusiastic about it? Why have so many of us failed to be excited by Judaism's treasures? Most Jewish families still gather for some form of Passover seder, but we know how many of us enter the seder with an attitude of "been there – done that," paying little or no attention to the rituals or the text of the Haggadah. We sense that the so-called wicked child, who asks "What is all this service to you," is in certain ways better than most, because at least he cares enough to ask a question and shows some signs of interest. We take heart in that he seeks an answer, an answer that can have the potential of turning him around and bringing him back to the active community.

Walk into a bookstore (while some still exist) and look at the discount table. Look at the computer books that are now selling for $3.99, marked down from their original $39.99. Open the front of the books and look at the publication date. You will see 2011, maybe even 2012 or 2013, now steeply discounted because they are out-dated.

Look at the same remainder table. Look for copies of the Babylonian Talmud, which was not completed three years ago, but some 1,500 years ago. You won't find one, because our sacred texts, from the invention of printing in 1450, to this very day, sell substantially the same number of copies each year.

Unlike the books and tools of modern technology, they have no limits to their shelf life. Rather, the texts and the rituals of tradition last forever. They remind us, in a world where few things last very long at all, where this morning's innovation is this afternoon's relic, that there is a place for timelessness, that there is a place for those cherished traditions that anchor us into an eternal continuum.

Prisoner release must benefit Israel: Netanyahu

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel won't release more Palestinian prisoners without getting something in return, and such a deal will be brought to the cabinet for approval, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu made the statements Sunday morning at a meeting of his Likud party government ministers ahead of the weekly cabinet meeting.

The remarks came a day after Israel missed a deadline for releasing a fourth group of Palestinians from Israeli prisons. Israel had agreed in August to release a total of 104 prisoners, including 14 Israeli-Arabs, in order to jump-start peace negotiations, which are scheduled to end at the close of next month.

"I suggest that all speculation be avoided until the full picture becomes clear, and this could happen in a matter of a few days," Netanyahu said.

"Either this is going to be settled or it's going to fall apart. At any rate, there won't be any deal until it's clear what the State of Israel is getting in return, and if there is a deal it will be brought to the government for approval."

The Times of Israel and Ha'aretz reported that Israel had offered to release another 400 Palestinian prisoners if the Palestinians agreed to extend the talks past their nine-month deadline and again agree not to turn to international bodies, including the United Nations, for statehood recognition.

Israeli Economy Minister Naftali Bennett, head of the Jewish Home party, said he would work to prevent the release of additional prisoners, saying in a Sunday morning Facebook post that he has received "hundreds of inquiries" about the rumoured deal.

"Let me be clear: this will not happen," he said in a Facebook post.

Also Sunday, chief Palestinian peace negotiator Saeb Erekat reportedly issued a statement disputing that the prisoner releases had anything to do with continuation or progress in the peace talks. Instead, the Palestinian Maan news agency reported, Erekat said that Israel's agreement to release the 104 prisoners held since before the 1993 Oslo Accords was in exchange for Palestinian agreement not to turn to international bodies to achieve statehood.

He said the Palestinians were still holding "sensitive talks" with the United States and Israel.

Israelis want Reform, Conservative Jews recognized

JTA

Nearly half of Israelis surveyed said Israel's Chief Rabbinate should officially recognize Reform and Conservative Judaism.

In the poll of 500 adults, 49 per cent "strongly feel that the Chief Rabbinate should officially recognize the Reform and Conservative streams of Judaism," Walla.com reported, because this "will in turn strengthen the connection with American Jews."

The poll, published March 27, was commissioned by the Ruderman Family Foundation and conducted by Teleseker polling. It focused on how Israelis perceive the relationship between their countrymen and state institutions and U.S. Jews.

Asked about whether the views of American Jews on the peace process should be taken into account, 30 per cent of respondents said "to some extent," 22 per cent said "to a great extent" and 18 per cent said "not at all."

Thirty-one per cent of respondents said that Diaspora Jews should not be represented in the Knesset while 29 per cent said Diaspora Jews should be represented "to some extent."

The survey was conducted ahead of a trip to New York and Boston that the Ruderman Family Foundation is organizing for six Knesset members to learn more about U.S. Jewry.

Should Israel be defined as a 'Jewish state'?

David Berlin
Special to The CJN

The Arab League issued an official communiqué on March 26, declaring that "it would never recognize Israel as a Jewish state." The statement came near the end of a two-day Arab leaders' summit in Kuwait.

Addressing the plenary a day earlier, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas charged that during the past eight months of negotiations, Israel has refused to budge an inch on its settlement plan. Abbas reproached Israel for aggressively pursuing the "Judaization of Jerusalem" and for its relentless expansion of the settlement project.

The Arab weekly Al-Ahram noted that while the "Gaza Strip receives nearly 40 per cent of its food and clothes through the Karm Abu Salem crossing, this crossing is closed on Jewish holidays.

None of these charges, nor the Arab League's incorrigible position, surprised many Israelis. On the contrary, at least since U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry recommended that Israel back away from the Jewish state designation, the issue has thoroughly and often madly engaged Jews, not only in Israel, but also in North America and the European Union.

Indeed, the debate has become so intense that Ari Shavit, a senior columnist for Ha'aretz newspaper, found it fit to suggest that an overall offensive is being waged by American and Israeli peace seekers who are furiously attacking the Jewish People's right to self-definition.

Shavit insists that such a right should be upheld. He claims that just as Israel must recognize Palestine as a Palestinian homeland, so, too, must the Arab states in general, and Palestinian leaders in particular, acknowledge Israel as a Jewish homeland.

Like Naftali Bennett, the leader of the Jewish Home party, Shavit believes that if there is no recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, there will also not be a two-state solution.

Other Israelis dismiss both the logic and the morality of this position. To Israelis like Y., former deputy head of the Mossad, demanding that Abbas recognize Israel as a Jewish state is forcing him to betray the 1.3 million Arab-Israelis currently living on the Israeli side of the Green Line. Over coffee in downtown Tel Aviv recently, Y. told me that at the office (misrad – which is how Mossad members refer to their headquarters), they used to call Benjamin Netanyahu's demand for recognition of a Jewish state "the goat trick."

The goat trick, Y. explained, always comes at the end of a round of negotiations, when one of the negotiators says, "And oh, by the way, I also want that goat of yours. This last demand, as trivial as it may sometimes be, is the straw that breaks the camel's back… It has no other meaning than to kill negotiations."

To many older Israelis, the analogy "Palestine for Palestinians" = "Israel for Jews" is not only a good example of bad logic (it should read Palestine for Palestinians = Israel for Israelis), nor the end of John Kerry's initiative, but even more, it is also the death knell of the original Israeli spirit.

In an essay titled "Israelis used to be Hebrews. Now what are we?" the 90-year-old Israeli poet Haim Guri reminded his fellow countrymen that as Hebrews (Ivrim), we Israelis were once far less Jewish. "There was the General Federation of Hebrew Workers…, Tel Aviv, the first Hebrew city, the Hebrew University…" There was a demand: "Ivri daber Ivrit" – a Hebrew person speaks Hebrew.

Hebrew identity, Guri wrote, was not the diametric opposite of Jewish identity, which is how the Canaanite movement saw it. Rather, it was an expression of a historical and revolutionary change of direction among those who came from the Diaspora and their offspring. Before the First Zionist Congress in 1897, author Micha Joseph Berdyczewski asked, "Are we the last Jews or the first Hebrews?"

Being Hebrew was an expression of renewal and change, Guri said. "When we filled the streets in 1939…, tens of thousands demonstrating against the British White Paper, we shouted, 'Free immigration,' 'a Hebrew state.' We did not call for a Jewish state."

How will this still civil, civil war come to an end? According to Hebrew University history professor Daniel Bateman, a lot depends on world Jewry, which must now decide whether it can live with Israel as a modern nation state that's inwardly Jewish but does not wear Judaism on its sleeve, whether it still needs Israel to remain explicitly Jewish. What is certain is that unless world Jewry feels confident enough in itself, unless, that is, the Diaspora is prepared to cut the umbilical chord strapping it to the State of Israel, and unless world Jewry grants Israelis the freedom to duke it out amongst themselves and promises to remain faithful no matter how things pan out, unless that happens there will probably be no peace agreement now or at any time in the future.

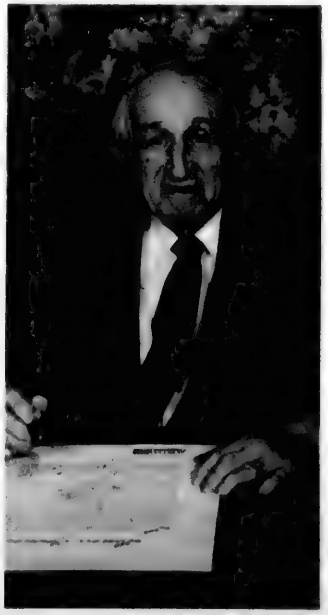
A bright light in the life of Jewish Toronto goes out with the passing of Morris Flicht



Morris Flicht

In 2011, Morris Flicht z"l included his story in The Jewish Foundation's Book of Life, an ever-growing archival collection of family stories from those who have left a legacy to ensure the future of the Jewish community. These narratives reveal the unique road to philanthropy travelled by each storyteller. Morris, who passed away on March 18, 2014, was a long-time supporter of United Jewish Appeal, a Chair of UJA's Societies Division for over 20 years, and a talented, passionate and tireless UJA canvasser for over 50 years. Morris's legacy lives on through his story, his endowment fund, which he established at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to perpetuate his gift to the UJA Annual Campaign, and, more than anything, through the countless lives he touched with his warmth, compassion and wit.

Giving is far greater than receiving — that is one of the most valuable lessons my father taught me. He was a labourer, a Polish immigrant in Toronto, who arrived with my mother and me at the time of the Great Depression. He never made a lot of money, but what he lacked monetarily, he made up for spiritually. He always visited family and friends who were ill in the hospital, he always had a smile to offer anyone he passed on the street, and he remained active with his Beizetchiner Society his entire life. All the while, he maintained a committed Jewish life by davening every morning before his eight o'clock shift at the factory would begin, and performing cantorial services when he was called upon.

My mother was also an extremely devoted person, who looked after my father, me and two siblings, her parents, and two brothers. We were immigrants, so we remained very close — physically, because we all lived together in one home; and emotionally, because we spent so much quality time together, rooted deeply in Jewish tradition and practice.

For these reasons, it was inevitable that I would seek to help others throughout my life. My parents' giving nature was infectious.

I became a chartered accountant and grew my business over time. But what fulfilled me was my volunteerism. With my late wife, Ruth, to whom I was married for fifty-six years, we gave of our time to many charities including the State of Israel, B'nai Brith, UJA telethons, UJA Societies Division, and others.

We saw the community expand exponentially over two short generations, and today it astounds me how the Jewish community is thriving. I can only hope that this upswing will continue.

In order to contribute to the strength and fortitude of my community, I would like my gift to continue even after I am gone. That is why I set up an endowment fund with the Jewish Foundation of Toronto. Hopefully, some will remember that I did something, that I was not simply existing. And that, as my father showed me, I, too, can impress on others the value of tzedakah, in various forms.

Every Life has a Story... Lives and stories that build a community, inspire hope, honour family, value tzedakah and create a future of compassion and caring. May Morris Flicht's memory be for a blessing, and his legacy reflect his love of community. For more information on creating your Jewish legacy, call the Jewish Foundation at 416-631-5703.

Olmert found guilty of accepting bribes

JTA

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert was found guilty of accepting bribes in the Holyland corruption case.

Tel Aviv District Court Judge David Rosen announced the conviction on Monday morning in what has been called the country's largest corruption scandals. Olmert could face up to 10 years in prison.

Nine other former senior Olmert associates and businessmen also were found guilty on various charges including former Olmert bureau chief Shula Zaken, who on Sunday had agreed to testify against Olmert in exchange for a plea bargain; former Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski; and former chairman of Israel's Bank Hapoalim, Danny Dankner.

Olmert, who was convicted of receiving about $150,000 in bribes through his brother, Yossi, becomes the first former Israeli prime minister to be convicted of taking a bribe.

Rosen said in his decision that Olmert lied in court. "Olmert's statement doesn't reflect reality – Olmert lied in court," the judge said.

Olmert resigned as prime minister in September 2008 after police investigators recommended that he be indicted in multiple corruption scandals.

The Jerusalem District Court acquitted Olmert in 2012 on charges of fraud, breach of trust, tax evasion and falsifying corporate records in what became known as the Talansky and Rishon Tours affairs. He was found guilty on a charge of breach of trust in what is known as the Investment Center case. He appealed the verdict.

Israel abstains in UN Ukraine vote

JTA

WASHINGTON — Israel abstained from the U.S.-led bid to isolate Russia at the United Nations in the wake of its takeover of Crimea.

The non-binding resolution, which passed in the General Assembly on March 27 in a 100-11 vote with 58 abstentions, calls on member states "to desist and refrain from actions aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and territorial integrity of Ukraine, including any attempts to modify Ukraine's borders through the threat or use of force or other unlawful means."

It also declares a referendum held earlier this month to validate last month's Russian takeover to have "no validity."

Among those approving the resolution were leading U.S. allies including Canada and Poland.

It was not clear why Israel abstained. Israeli diplomats are on strike.

Israel has maintained a low profile throughout the crisis.

Aliyah fair draws thousands

The Times of Israel

PARIS — Thousands of French Jews attended an information fair in Paris about moving to Israel amid an unprecedented spike in immigration to the Jewish state and a wave of anti-Semitic attacks.

According to the Jewish Agency, aliyah to Israel from France saw a dramatic threefold increase in January and February 2014 compared to a year before. Some 3,280 immigrants from France arrived in Israel in 2013, compared to 1,917 in the previous year.

Sunday's fair, organized by the Jewish Agency for Israel in co-operation with the Ministry of Aliyah and Immigrant Absorption and the World Zionist Organization, offered information from representatives of many Israeli organizations and institutions, including government ministries.

More than 1,000 students participated in Jewish Agency-funded Israel experience programs over the past year, the organization said, twice as many as two years before. The immigration rate for French students who enrol in the Masa Israel program, for example, stands at 70 per cent.

The Drancy-based Bureau for National Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism, a watchdog group known as BNVCA, has recorded a spate of anti-Semitic incidents in France in recent weeks, including a violent attack on a Jewish teacher and a knife attack on a Paris rabbi and his son.

Passover desserts to delight

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Even though everyone is full to brimming by the end of both seders, be it the first or the second, everybody I know serves dessert. And sweets in general, be they cakes, cookies or candies, seem to have a special place on our counter, our fridge or pantry during the holidays.

Perhaps it's the challenge of coming up with divine cakes and other delicacies during the eight days when no flour can be used. Perhaps we feel that since it's the holidays, we can indulge. I don't profess to know the answer since I too love to make desserts, basically anytime, but especially during holidays. And truly, the proscription against flour isn't much of a hurdle. We're lucky to have an abundance of fruit to roast, braise or poach, cookies can easily be adapted using potato starch and matzah meal, and flourless cakes have been popular for many a year.

That being said, I've opted to share a few favourites with you this year, one a fruit, one an everyday snack and one a cake so scrumptious that your family and guests will not only debate whether it's a cheesecake, a dense cake or a brownie, but will actually request seconds.

BANANA BREAD

A standard favourite that's great to have on hand for snacks or when you're tired of matzah with butter and jam!

4 large, very ripe bananas
1 cup packed light brown sugar
1/2 cup canola or vegetable oil
2 eggs
2 tsp. grated orange rind
1/4 cup orange juice
1 tsp.vanilla
1 cup potato starch
1 cup matzah meal
2 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. baking powder
pinch salt

Preheat the oven to 325. Lightly grease a 9x5-inch loaf pan. Set aside.

In a large bowl, mash together the bananas and sugar. Whisk in the oil, eggs, orange rind and juice and vanilla.

In a separate bowl, combine the potato starch, matzah meal, baking soda, baking powder and salt. Pour the wet mixture over the dry mixture, mixing with a wooden spoon just until combined. The mixture will look a bit runny. Pour the batter into the prepared loaf pan.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 60 to 70 minutes or until golden brown and the loaf springs back when lightly pressed. Cool in pan on rack. Makes 1 loaf.

HONEY ROASTED PEARS WITH MACAROONS AND CARAMEL SAUCE

Try to buy firm but ripe pears that will hold their shape. Basically, any type of macaroons or cookie crumbs will work in this recipe.

Chocolate brown cake is unbelievably delicious

4 Bosc pears, ripe but still firm
2 tbsp. unsalted margarine or butter
1/4 cup honey
1/2 cup orange juice
Caramel Sauce:
3/4 cup granulated sugar
1/3 cup oil-based liquid whip topping
2 tbsp. margarine
Garnish:
8 small honey or almond macaroons, crumbled

Preheat the oven to 375. Peel and halve pears, leaving stems intact. Using a melon baller or teaspoon, remove the centre core from the pears, leaving about an inch of cavity.

Grease a 13x9-in. glass baking dish with the butter. Place the pears, cut side up in the dish. Drizzle the honey over the pears. Pour the orange juice over. Turn pears over so that they are cut side down.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 30 minutes. Turn pears over so that they are cut side up. Roast for another 30 minutes, basting with the sauce twice and adding up to 1/4 cup more juice if the liquid is being absorbed too quickly. The pears should be well glazed and very soft. (Pears can be covered with plastic wrap and kept at room temperature for up to 6 hours or refrigerated for up to 24 hours ahead. Bring to room temperature before serving).

Meanwhile, in saucepan, stir together the sugar with 1/4 cup warm water over medium heat just until sugar is dissolved. Bring sugar to a boil; boil gently, brushing down sides of pan with brush dipped in cold water, for about 7 minutes or until mixture turns a deep amber colour. Averting face, immediately pour in 1/3 cup of the whip topping. Cook for 1 to 2 minutes longer or until any solidified caramel has melted. Stir in margarine. Let cool. (Caramel can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Rewarm in microwave for 20 to 30 seconds if it hardens).

To serve, place one pear half on dessert plate. Crumble macaroon into cavity. Drizzle with caramel sauce. Makes 8 servings.

CHOCOLATE BROWNIE CAKE WITH VANILLA CHEESECAKE MARBLE

This cake is unbelievably delicious, but it requires planning ahead since it needs to cool for at least 6 hours before serving. I have made it with great success the day before. Be sure to allow at least 20 minutes for it to come to room temperature before slicing into thin wedges. In addition, be sure to use a 9-inch pan with sides that are at least 2-inches high since the cake does expand in the oven. It will collapse once it cools but this just adds to the visual appeal. Do not use a springform pan.

Vanilla Cheesecake Layer:
8 oz. cream cheese, softened
2/3 cup granulated sugar
1 egg
1 tbsp. vanilla
Chocolate Brownie Cake Layer:
10 oz. semisweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
1/3 cup unsalted margarine or butter, softened
3 eggs
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. instant espresso granules
1 tsp. vanilla
1 tbsp. potato starch
pinch salt

Preheat the oven to 300. Lightly grease a 9x2-in. round cake pan. Line the bottom with parchment paper. Set aside.

In a bowl set over a pot of lightly simmering water, melt the chocolate with the margarine until completely melted and smooth. Set aside to cool slightly.

Meanwhile, make the vanilla cheesecake layer. Using a stand-up mixer fitted with the paddle attachment, or a hand held mixer, beat the cream cheese until fluffy. Scrape down the bowl with a spatula. With the machine running, gradually add the sugar. Beat for 3 minutes, scraping down the sides at least once. Add the egg and vanilla, beating until smooth.

Using a clean bowl and the whisk attachment, beat the eggs with the sugar until very pale and thick, about 5 minutes. Dissolve the espresso granules in the vanilla; beat into the egg mixture. Fold one-third of the egg mixture into the melted chocolate. Sprinkle the potato starch and salt over the chocolate mixture and fold in with the remaining egg mixture.

Spread just over half of the chocolate mixture into the prepared pan. Top with 2/3 of the vanilla batter. Then drop spoonfuls of the remaining chocolate and vanilla batter over top. Using the tip of a knife, gently swirl the mixtures together to create a marble pattern.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven for 37 to 40 minutes or until a toothpick inserted on the edges comes out with a few moist crumbs clinging to it. Do not overbake. Cool entirely in pan on rack. Cover and refrigerate for at least 6 hours or overnight.

Invert to remove from pan, remove parchment paper. Place on serving platter and serve at room temperature.Makes 12 to 16 servings.

Nuts over Passover

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Don't get me wrong – I like matzah, I actually look forward to eating it one week a year, covered in charoset or slathered with butter and jam. What an ideal Passover treat! Matzah meal is great too in certain recipes, as it helps bind ingredients together and give dishes substance and body.

Many Passover dishes are laden with matzah meal. I understand this and recommend it for some savoury dishes. On the other hand, I don't love using it in most desserts. It's, well, blah. I have always relied on the input of my family when cooking and baking, especially when creating new recipes.

At Passover, I have learned not to bake with too much matzah meal or matzah cake meal. My kids will taste a Passover dessert that depends mostly on matzah meal in the recipe, whether it be chocolate, lemon or some other delicious sweet, and say, "Well, it's OK, but it tastes like Passover!"

I think it's important to prepare some desserts with little or no matzah meal or cake meal. Of course, sometimes it's necessary to add a little, just to hold a batter together, which is the case with my Passover Walnut "Mandelbrot." But walnut flour, which is easy to make yourself, masks the matzah flavour very well. Nuts are a great substitute for matzah meal in many recipes. Nuts taste wonderful in a dessert just on their own. Additionally, nuts pair well with fruit-themed desserts such as orange or lemon, and we all know that nuts and chocolate have always been a remarkable team.

Passover mandelbrot – or biscotti

ORANGE ALMOND CAKE

2-1/2 cups blanched almonds
3 tbsp. sugar
1 extra-large orange
6 large eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup sugar
vegetable oil for greasing the pan
1 orange for garnish
Glaze:
1/4 cup orange juice
2 tbsp. sugar

In a heavy pot, cover the orange with water and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to a simmer and cook for 1-1/2 hours, checking that water continues to cover the orange. Cool.

Preheat oven to 375. In processor, grind the almonds with 3 tbsp. sugar until finely ground. Remove from processor. Cut orange open and remove any seeds. Process the entire orange until pureed, add eggs, vanilla, salt and sugar and combine. Add back the almonds and combine. Line a 10-in. springform pan with parchment paper and grease the bottom and sides well with vegetable oil. Pour in batter and bake for 60 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in centre of cake comes out clean. Cool before removing from pan.

To glaze cake, mix orange juice and sugar together until sugar is dissolved. Using a toothpick, poke holes in the top of the cake and spoon orange mixture over the cake allowing the mixture to soak into the cake. Refrigerate until serving. Garnish with orange slices.

ALMOND BROWNIES

1/2 cup margarine
1 cup sugar
7 eggs, separated
8 oz. bittersweet chocolate
8 oz. finely ground almonds
1/8 tsp. salt
1/2 cup chocolate chips or broken chocolate pieces

Line a 9x12-in. Pyrex baking dish with parchment paper and grease with some margarine. Break up bittersweet chocolate into small pieces and, in a Pyrex or microwave-safe bowl, melt the chocolate in the microwave for 50-60 seconds. Remove from microwave and stir with a fork until all the chocolate is melted. Cool.

Preheat oven to 350. In food processor or with a mixer, cream margarine and sugar. Add in egg yolks. Add chocolate to butter mixture then add in the ground almonds. Place egg whites in a clean bowl and with clean beaters whip until soft peaks form. Fold egg whites into chocolate batter until no streaks of white remain. Fold in the chocolate chips or pieces. Pour batter into baking dish and bake for 45 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean.

Cool completely before cutting into squares.

Garnish with some additional melted bittersweet chocolate dropped from a spoon.

PASSOVER WALNUT MANDELBROT (BISCOTTI)

Since this mandelbrot is not made from almonds, and mandel means almonds, I give you permission to call them biscotti if you wish. And even though I did sneak in a small amount of matzah meal, these cookies taste nutty and delicious. You will never guess they were intended especially for Passover.

2 cups sugar
1 cup margarine
6 large eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
3 cups walnuts, finely ground
1-1/2 cups matzah meal
3/4 cup potato starch
1/2 tsp. salt
2 cups walnuts, chopped
1 cup raisins

Preheat oven to 350. Line 2-3 cookie sheets with parchment paper. Cream margarine and sugar in processor or with a mixer. Add eggs and vanilla, beat well. Add ground walnuts, matzah meal, potato starch and salt and combine. Add chopped walnuts and raisins. Spoon mixture onto the parchment paper in consecutive drops lengthwise across the cookie sheet, one length on each side of the sheet. Batter will spread. Take a knife and tidy up the sides.

Bake for about 35 minutes, or until golden and firm. Remove from oven and cool on baking racks. When cool, turn oven up to 400.

Carefully remove "logs" to a cutting board and with a serrated knife cut into cookies about three-quarters of an inch wide. Place the cookies on their sides and toast for about 12 minutes or until golden brown. Cool. Store in a covered container. Freezes well.

At some point during Pesach preparations, we've all tried to convert a mainstream recipe into a Pesach one, only to discover that we don't have a clue as to what to substitute for a chametz ingredient. This panic moment is why I started compiling my list of Passover substitutes. I've added some new substitutions this year. If anyone has any other substitutions that they would like to share please let me know at eztlog@gmail.com.

A reader asked for a conversion to metric chart so here are some equivalents:
1 teaspoon = 5 millilitres
1 pound = .45 kilograms
1 tablespoon = 15 millilitres
1 cup = .24 litres
1 ounce = 28 grams

- 1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine
- 16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2-2/3 tbsp. oil and 4-1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender
- 1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for dairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1 cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover nondairy creamer. Stir and steep 5 minutes.
- For butter in baking or cooking, use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt.
- 1 cup honey = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water
- 1 cup molasses = 1 cup honey (and vice-versa) now that the flavour will be different
- 1 cup corn syrup = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy
- 1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar
- 1 cup marshmallow cream or 2.5 oz. = 8 large marshmallows or 1 cup miniature marshmallows
- 1 cup of flour, substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together
- 1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch
- 1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch
- 1 tsp. cream of tartar = 1-1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1-1/2 tsp. vinegar
- 1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal
- 1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzahs ground in a food processor
- 1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted
- 3 crumbled matzahs = 2 cups matzah farfel
- 1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine
- chicken fat or gribenes = 2 caramelized onions. Sauté 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.
- 1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water
- 1-1/4 cup sweetened condensed milk = 1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tablespoons margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.
- 1 cup wine = 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.
- For frying: instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.
- eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz egg substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes, the recipes will probably be OK. However, if you want to avoid them (and I do) you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 teaspoon of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.
- Italian seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/8 tsp. rubbed dried sage. This can be substituted for 1-1/2 teaspoons Italian seasoning.
- curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger. Makes 2/3 cup.
- pancake syrup = use fruit jelly, not jam and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave-safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.
- seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tbsp. salt. Mix to combine. Makes 1/4 cup.
- rice vinegar = 3 tbsp. lime juice plus 2 tsp. sugar
- cider vinegar = 2 tbsp. lemon juice plus 1 tbsp. orange juice
- flavoured vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades
- water chestnuts = substitute raw jicama
- orange liqueur = substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate

Vegetarian and vegan dishes

Dorothy Lichtblau
Special to The CJN

During Passover, Jews around the globe remember our ancestors' liberation from slavery in ancient Egypt and the subsequent formation of the Israelite people at Mt. Sinai. It also is a festival of renewal, abundance and transformation celebrated around the family dining table. Here we pass down our foundational story, eat symbolic foods, sing, feast and drink throughout the night, with family and friends.

However, some feel this holiday is burdensome because of the many preparations, expenses and dietary limitations. Yet, despite the additional challenges, a growing number of Jews choose to be vegetarian or vegan to improve their health, for spiritual reasons or because this way of life aligns with their ethical views.

Debra Eklove, a Toronto-area Ayurveda nutritionf consultant, says a vegetarian lifestyle came gradually but naturally to her since it ultimately added to her well-being.

She interprets the few menu choices available to vegetarians at Passover as the freedom to explore the possibilities of spring crops.

Eklove likes this recipe she received from a teacher of Ayurveda cooking because it can be made as written or modified to suit the season and taste buds.

BOK CHOY IN CREAMY CASHEW BUTTER SAUCE

1 tbsp. cashew butter
2 tbsp. unrefined oil or clarified butter
1 tsp. daikon radish, minced (optional)
1 tsp. dried basil
1 small carrot, cut into matchsticks
4 stalks bok choy, or green of your choice, cut crosswise into 1-inch pieces
Sea salt and pepper to taste

Place the cashew butter in a small bowl. Using a fork mix in enough water to make it creamy. Set aside.

Warm a skillet or wok over medium heat. Add the oil. When it is warm, add the minced daikon and basil or herb or spice of your choice and sauté for 1 minute or until aromatic. Add the carrot and stir-fry over moderate heat for 2 minutes or until the carrot softens. Add the bok choy or green of your choice and stir-fry for an additional 2-3 minutes until crisp tender.

Season with salt and pepper. Stir cashew purée into the vegetables and cook for 1 minute or just until the sauce bubbles and thickens.

Serve with rice or quinoa depending on your Passover traditions. Makes 4 servings.

Though a long time vegetarian, a few years ago Lee Ann Gallant and her family decided to give up all animal-related foods and become vegan. The midtown Toronto pediatrician explains, "We choose to avoid foods that are procured through animal suffering and feel that our sacrifice is minimal compared to what animals go through."

Though now this perennial favourite floats in vegetable stock not chicken soup, her family looks forward to matzah balls "because it makes us feel warm and fuzzy thinking of holiday dinners with the grandparents of our kids." Gallant recommends this Passover recipe because "it feeds the body and soul" and comes from Colleen Patrick-Goudreau's "wonderful introduction to veganism," The Vegan Table – 200 Unforgettable Recipes for Entertaining Every Guest at Every Occasion.

Matzah ball soup and asparagus appetizer

MATZAH BALL SOUP

3 tbsp. ground flaxseed
6 tbsp. water
1 tbsp. olive oil
1/2 yellow onion minced
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
1-1/2 tbsp. minced fresh parsley
6 cups homemade vegetable stock
1 carrot peeled and finely shredded
1 tbsp. chopped dill for garnish

Whip flaxseed and water in food processor for 2-3 minutes until a thick, creamy, almost yogurt-like consistency.

In a pan, warm oil and sauté onion until golden brown.

Combine sautéed onion, matzah meal, salt and parsley in a bowl. Cover and place in refrigerator for at least 2 hours or overnight.

When ready, fill a large soup pot with vegetable stock and bring to a boil. Remove matzah batter from refrigerator and form into walnut size balls, about 1-inch round. To help you form the balls dip your hands in water before scooping and rolling each one. You should be able to make 10-12 balls.

Once the broth has boiled, reduce the heat to a rapid simmer and carefully drop the balls into the liquid. Reduce the heat to a simmer. Cover and cook for 20-30 minutes.

When ready, ladle stock into soup bowls and place one or two matzah balls in each bowl. Sprinkle each bowl with shredded carrot and chopped dill.

A respected religious leader and adult educator in Toronto's liberal Jewish community, Elyse Goldstein is the rabbi of City Shul, a Reform congregation in central Toronto. She says, "I have been a vegetarian for over 30 years and raised three vegetarian children with my vegetarian husband. Kashrut was meant to combat cruelty to animals but the kosher factory-farming meat industry has lost sight of that goal. Vegetarianism is kashrut taken to its ethical consequence!"

The following recipe was created by the Goldstein-Sienna family. According to the rabbi, "it is an appetizer that has many of the traditional elements of the seder and easily takes the place of the usual gefilte fish. It's "spring" in all its glory!"

'KARPAS AND MAROR' APPETIZER: ASPARAGUS IN HORSERADISH SAUCE

1 lb. fresh asparagus, lightly steamed (or you can broil it with a bit of olive oil)
1/2 cup plain yogurt
1/4 cup mayonnaise
1/4 cup red grated horseradish from the jar
1 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
1 tsp. lemon juice (fresh or from a bottle) dash of salt and pepper
4 hard-boiled eggs
1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley

Trim the ends of the asparagus and lightly steam or broil.

Mix together the horseradish sauce ingredients.

Arrange cooked asparagus spears on a plate and drizzle with sauce, then garnish with hard-boiled egg slices and chopped fresh parsley. Serves 4 and can be easily doubled, tripled, or quadrupled.

Charoset – part of the seder no matter how you make it

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

What Passover seder symbol is common to all communities but is not mentioned in the biblical passage that enjoins us to eat the paschal offering, matzah and bitter herbs? Charoset.

We define charoset loosely as a paste of fruit, spices, wine and matzah meal, symbolic of the mortar used by the Hebrews when they were slaves in Egypt.

The word is of unknown origin, but may be from the word heres, meaning clay, because of its colour. The custom of eating charoset is thought to have come from the time of the Babylonians who dipped food in relishes or sauces to add flavour.

Some years ago, I surprised all my seder guests by serving both the Ashkenazi version and a different Sephardi version, which everyone loved and wanted in future years.

The New York Times Passover Cookbook, edited by Linda Amster, wrote that the Iraqi version is one of the oldest and most time-consuming recipes, dating back to the Babylonian exile of 579 BCE. Made into a jam from dates, grapes, pomegranate and bee honey, it was a sweetener in the ancient world and is still used by Iraqi, Burmese, Syrian and Indian Jews.

The Talmud says charoset must be sharp in taste and similar to clay in substance and colour, and thus there are variations according to communities.

Most Ashkenazim do not follow the sharp and pungent idea, whereas Sephardim do. Ashkenazim tend to use apples, chopped almonds, cinnamon, red wine and perhaps matzah meal. Sometimes other nuts are used.

Sephardim and those from Middle Eastern countries tend to use fruits that grew in Eretz Yisrael in biblical times such as grapes, figs, dates, almonds and pomegranates. Israelis often turn charoset into a dessert by adding bananas, dates, orange juice and sugar.

Abraham Chill, author of The Minhagim (customs), writes that each ingredient symbolizes something different from the Egypt experience: the whole mixture stands for the mortar used by the Jews in making bricks. Wine is for the blood of the Jewish infants thrown into the Nile. Almonds are used because the Hebrew word for almond, shaked, is also a word that means to accelerate, so God accelerated the end of slavery. Apples are used because it was said Jewish women gave birth to their babies under apple trees in order to avoid detection by the Egyptians. The cinnamon resembles the colour of the bricks they made.

In her book, The Jewish Holiday Kitchen, Joan Nathan states that charoset is "one of the most popular and discussed ritual foods served at the seder." She says the fruits and nuts refer to verses in Song of Songs mentioning an apple tree and the garden of nuts. The red wine recalls the Red Sea.

Because the maror or bitter herb is so strong, some say the real purpose of charoset is to allay the bitterness. As part of the ritual seder, the charoset and maror are placed between matzot to make a sandwich that is said to have been invented by the first century CE's Rabbi Hillel, hence, Hillel's sandwich.

Different Jewish communities have variations on the ingredients. Jews from the Island of Rhodes use dates, walnuts, ginger and sweet wine. Jews of Salonika, Greece, add raisins. Other Greek Jews use walnuts, almonds, pine nuts, raisins, cinnamon, cloves and red wine and spread it thickly on matzah. Turkish Jews include orange.

A Moroccan told me she used some of the seven species from the Bible in her charoset – dates, almonds, nuts, pomegranate seeds, figs, wine and cinnamon.

"The Food Maven," Matthew Goodman, once wrote in The Forward that Moroccan Jews sometimes make charoset paste and roll it into balls. He says this is a legacy from Jews of Medieval Spain who made the balls of apples, dried fruit, almonds, cooked chestnuts, sugar and cinnamon but no wine and then drizzled the balls with white vinegar before serving.

Jews of Venice use chestnut paste, dates, figs, poppy seeds, walnuts, pine nuts, orange peel, dried apricots, raisins, brandy and honey.

Jews of Bukharia use nuts, almonds, dates, raisins, apples and wine.

Egyptian charoset contains dates, nuts, banana, apples, wine, cinnamon and pomegranate seeds.

An Iraqi woman told me instead of charoset as we know it, they would buy a special date honey and sprinkle chopped nuts on top.

Goodman confirms this, explaining its foundation is date syrup called halek, made by boiling dates, straining the liquid and then reducing it over a low flame until thick. In fact, halek is one of the earliest of all sweeteners and may be the reference in "land flowing with milk and honey," because bees did not appear until later. Chopped walnuts or almonds are then added to the syrup. Jews of Calcutta also follow this custom.

A Dutch woman told me they make a chunky mixture with more apples and fewer nuts plus cinnamon, sugar, raisins and sweet wine.

Jews from Surinam in Dutch Guiana use seven fruits and coconut.

Following the injunction to have a sharp taste, Persian Jews use dates, pistachio nuts, almonds, raisins, apples, orange, bananas, pomegranate seeds, sweet wine, cloves, cardamom, cinnamon, vinegar and black pepper.

Likewise, Yemeni Jews use dates, raisins, almonds, nuts, figs, sesame seeds, apples, pomegranate seeds, grape juice, ginger, cinnamon, cardamom, cloves and black pepper.

Jews from Afghanistan pound charoset in a mortar with a pestle and use walnuts, hazelnuts, almonds, apples, sweet wine, pomegranate seeds, dates and black pepper.

Another Sephardi woman told me she combines almonds, dates, apples, orange juice, ginger and cinnamon then forms the mixture into tiny balls about the size of a large olive. The head of the family then mixes these balls with vinegar to resemble the mortar.

One exception I have found to Ashkenazim following the strictly sweet version was a friend whose father's family came from Galicia. He recalled their charoset was made from apples, nuts, wine, cinnamon and horseradish.

Whatever way you make charoset, be inventive and make several different kinds to serve.

Pesach recipes in the Yemeni tradition

Dorothy Lichtblau
Special to The CJN

Traditional Yemeni dishes are based on simple ingredients enhanced by a range of herbs and spices. The result is a flavourful cuisine.

In Toronto, the tiny Jewish Yemeni community, like many Jewish groups of the 21st century, celebrates festivals in more contemporary ways, but the stories and recipes of this tradition continue to be treasured.

Shaul Tsubari, a high school teacher and longtime Toronto resident, vividly recalls family Passover celebrations from his childhood in Israel.

"Cleaning and preparing for Passover was rigorous because customarily Yemenites were highly observant."

Tsubari recalls that every nook of his home was scoured to ensure there was no chametz, not even between the pages of books. Well in advance of the seders, his relatives would purchase a lamb or kid that would become a central part of the holiday feast attended by 40 to 50 family members and led by clan elders. Though every aspect of the seder was strictly followed, there was much joyful singing and plenty of delicious aromatic foods.

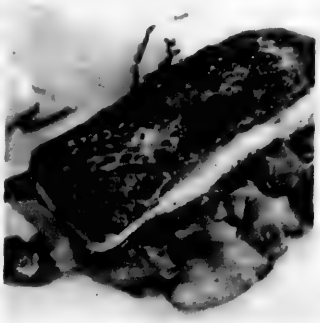
Tsubari explains that Yemeni Jews' long history in the Middle East means that rice and kitniyot are included with Passover meals, and that dishes are spicy. Zhug, a blend of crushed hot peppers, garlic, salt and oil, is a kitchen staple; honey is a popular sweetener, while lemon instead of vinegar is used to add a touch of sourness.

Tsubari's favourite childhood Passover dishes were matzah brei laced with zhug and Yemeni-style chicken soup.

Jennifer Badani's husband, Shlomo, has Yemeni roots, and she has many fond memories of seders at her sister-in-law's home.

"There was lots of singing, many guests and the food was tasty and interesting," she recalls.

Dishes that still make her mouth water are a spicy fish dish, Yemeni charoset, chicken soup and fruit salad spiked with orange liqueur. Regrettably, Jennifer's sister-in-law moved to Israel upon retirement. Now, the Badanis enjoy Yemeni Passover dishes with friends.



TSUBARI'S YEMENI CHAROSET

1/2 cup almonds
1/3 cup walnuts
8 oz. pitted dates
1/2 cup raisins
1-1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon pinch of ground cloves
1/4 tsp. ground ginger
1/4 tsp. ground cardamom
pinch of freshly ground pepper
2 to 4 tbsp. sweet red wine

Finely chop almonds and walnuts in a food processor almost to a powder. Remove nut powder from the processor then finely chop dates and raisins. Combine chopped nuts with chopped fruit in a bowl. Stir in spices. Gradually stir in enough wine to make a thick spread. Serve at room temperature or cold.

YEMENI FISH IN TOMATO SAUCE

From the Badani recipe collection

Sauce:
1 tbsp. each of olive oil, parsley, dill, garlic, chopped tomato and coriander red, green, orange and yellow pepper, 1 of each, chopped
1 tbsp. hot paprika, or to taste
1 tbsp. hawaij (Yemeni ground spice mixture, recipe below)
salt and pepper to taste
1 scallion, with stalk, chopped
3 lb. firm fleshed fish fillets (whiting, flounder, cod, pickerel or salmon)

Mix oil, tomato, parsley, dill, coriander, hot paprika, garlic, red, green, orange and yellow pepper in a large skillet and simmer on a low flame for 15 minutes. Add scallion to pan.

Sprinkle hawaij onto fish. Slide fish pieces carefully into baking dish for oven, making sure not to break them up.

Bake in the oven at 350 degrees for 30 minutes. Remove from flame and let cool.

Remove fish pieces to a serving dish and pour sauce on top. Serve slightly warm or at room temperature. Serves 4 as a main dish, 6 as an appetizer.

Hawaij: Spice Mixture
3 tbsp. black peppercorns
2 tbsp. garlic powder
2 tbsp. cumin
8 whole cloves
8 cardamom pods

In a spice or coffee grinder, or with a mortar and pestle, grind spices together finely and store in a tightly closed container.

YEMENI CHICKEN SOUP

From The Melting Pot website

2-1/4 lb. chicken quarters
3 carrots, peeled
2 small onions, roughly chopped
2 sticks celery, roughly chopped
6 potatoes cut in large pieces
1/2 bunch parsley
5 garlic cloves, lightly crushed
1 tbsp. hawaij spice

Wash the chicken well and place in large pot. Fill the pot with cold water until the chicken pieces are well submerged, then bring to boil. Once the water begins boiling, skim the surface of fat and other impurities.

Place vegetables and parsley into the pot, then sprinkle with hawaij spice, season with salt and pepper to taste, and return to a boil. Once water has reached boiling point, immediately reduce heat to simmer and cook for about 45 minutes.

Soup and chicken legs can be served separately, but are commonly eaten in the same bowl.

Provide plenty of matzah to dip into the broth.

Soy and teriyaki substitutes

SOY SAUCE SUBSTITUTE

This soy sauce substitute doesn't taste exactly like the real thing, but it makes a flavourful alternative for Pesach stir-fry.

2 tbsp. beef broth
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. oil
1/8 tsp. garlic powder
black pepper to taste
1/4 cup boiling water

Combine all the ingredients. At this point, you can either a) use the sauce as is, leaving for an hour to give the flavours a chance to blend, or b) for a thicker, richer sauce, boil the liquid until it is reduced by half, about 3 tablespoons. Store in a sealed container in the refrigerator. Makes 2/3 cup. Use the sauce within 3-4 days.

PASSOVER TERIYAKI SUBSTITUE

1/4 cup soy sauce substitute
1 cup water
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/4 tsp. garlic powder
5 tbsp. packed brown sugar
2 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. potato starch
1/4 cup cold water

In a small saucepan, combine all the ingredients except the potato starch and water. Whisk to combine. Gently start to heat the mixture. In a separate bowl, whisk together the potato starch and water until smooth. Immediately whisk the mixture into the warming liquid and continue stirring and cooking just until the mixture starts to thicken slightly. Immediately remove from heat and cool. Store, covered, in the refrigerator.

CASHEW SOUR CREAM

It's creamy and you can use it in any recipe that calls for sour cream. It refrigerates well.

1 cup raw cashews (must not be roasted or salted)
1/4 tsp. salt
1-2 tsp. apple cider vinegar
1 small lemon, juiced

Cover cashews with water and soak for a few hours, or overnight. Pour off all water, and place nuts in food processor. Add 1/4 cup cold water, salt, vinegar and lemon juice. Purée for 3-4 minutes or until completely smooth and creamy in consistency. Use in any recipe that calls for sour cream. Refrigerate in an airtight container for up to a week. Makes 1 cup.

CORN SYRUP SUBSTITUTE

2 cups white sugar
3/4 cup water
1/4 tsp. cream of tartar
1 dash salt

Combine all ingredients in a heavy, large pan. Stir and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to a simmer and put cover on it for 3 minutes to get sugar crystals off the sides of the pan. Uncover and cook until it reaches soft-ball stage. Stir often. Cool syrup and store in a covered container at room temperature.

OYSTER SAUCE SUBSTITUTE
Great with fish

1 mushroom/vegetable bouillon cube (or 1 tablespoon of the powdered stuff)
1/2 cup boiling water
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. potato starch
1 tsp. cold water

In a saucepan combine the bouillon, sugar and boiling water. Boil for 2 to 3 minutes.

While it's boiling, in a cup combine the potato starch and cold water, mix to combine and add mixture to the boiling broth. Simmer, whisking constantly until the mixture thickens.

Federation launches Jewish technology network

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation last week unveiled its program to bring together Jewish professionals by – what else? – bringing together Jewish professionals, as it unveiled its Jewish Technology Entrepreneurial Circle (JTEC).

"Our mantra," explained Elik Jaeger, the Israeli-born entrepreneur and brains behind the venture, is "connecting the community through technology."

The result can be "magic" as entrepreneurs, employees and others meet, network and mentor while creating new business ventures. JTEC will connect a new generation of community leaders and philanthropists to ensure a thriving Jewish community, he said.

About 150 people attended the sold-out event at 111 Richmond St., itself an innovative office building and collaborative work environment that serves as Google Canada's headquarters.

A panel of high-tech heavyweights, moderated by technology journalist Marc Saltzman, outlined their perspectives on the role technology and innovation can play for Jewish businesspeople.

The panel consisted of John Albright, co-founder and managing partner of Relay Ventures, an early stage investment fund focused on mobile connectivity;

Elik Jaeger

Daniel Debow, co-founder of Rypple and Workbrain, who now is senior vice-president at Salesforce.com; and Gary Lipovetsky, co-founder of Dealfind.com.

Saltzman kicked off the discussion by noting the importance of creating a strong technology and entrepreneurial community while encouraging mentorship and networking, "with a Jewish thread."

"We need a way to work together and solidify relationships," he said.

Saltzman said his visits to Israel highlighted the differences in the way high-tech business is done there compared to

Gary Lipovetsky

Canada. People in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem seemed to stick together more and "leverage their tool-set to work together." Canada's cultural diversity and geographic magnitude seems to breed a lack of togetherness, he suggested.

JTEC, he added, could be the birth of a technology-focused entrepreneurial community."

The speakers in turn described their entry into the world of business, each recounting in various degrees the importance of "commonality" and "collaboration" in producing successful ventures.

Sharing something you have in common, whether your school, a friend, a neighbourhood, or your Jewish heritage can open doors and at least warrant hearing their business pitch, Albright said.

Lipovetsky suggested that "Israel is like a big kibbutz," with plenty of collaboration. "I think that's what happens when you have a lot of Jews together.

"JTEC could be the kibbutz of technology in Canada," he added.

Debow noted that personal relationship in his life – including one with his babysitter – opened doors to him later in life.

"Investing is about trust," he said.

In his experience doing business with fellow Jews, failure is not an option. Falling short on a business deal or not coming through with something that was promised can kill a reputation, so "they only work their butts off," Debow said.

Daniel Debow

People pitching a product must show why their idea is worth an investor's cash. An idea alone is not good enough. You have to at least provide a prototype. "You have to come to a meeting with something done," he said.

Turning to the question of mentoring, Debow said it has to be a two-way street. The person being mentored should not just take, but also give something back to their mentor, perhaps even something as simple as a reference to an interesting article.

Lipovetsky said he sees "an entitlement mentality" among some young businesspeople, who expect investors to shower them with money for their projects.

Responding to a question from Saltzman on whether the focus of Canadian startups was too local, Albright said capital markets are global and they seek out products that are global. "Our biggest competition for local deals in Canada comes from outside Canada," he said.

Tech businesses should expand their scope, leave behind a local or regional perspective and think globally, Saltzman added.

Coffee table book explores India's Jews

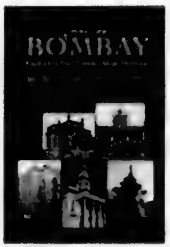
Bombay:
Exploring the Jewish Urban Heritage
Dr. Shaul Sapir
Bene Israel Heritage Museum



There are four distinct historic Jewish communities in India – the Cochin or Malabar Jews, the Bene-Israel Jews, the Bene-Menashe Jews and the Baghdadi Jews – author Shaul Sapir explains at the start of this magnificently presented coffee-table book co-published with the Genealogical Research Centre of India.

While the first three arrived in antiquity, the Baghdadis were the most recent arrivals. Descended from Jews born in Iraq and other Muslim countries (Afghanistan, Iran, Yemen, Syria), they began arriving in India about 1730, clustering in and around the cities of Bombay (Mumbai) and Calcutta (Kolkata). While many escaped persecution in their former homelands, many were also attracted by the enormous mercantile opportunities that these flourishing cities offered under British rule.

India's Baghdadi Jews supposedly comprised only about 10 per cent of the country's Jews, and the Baghdadis of Bombay were only two per cent of the total. Sapir devoted nine years to researching this particular group, which had a disproportionately huge and beneficial influence upon the city.

Bombay's Baghdadi Jews excelled as traders and bankers, profiting by their advantageous situation between East and West. David Sassoon (1792-1864), whose family dynasty was referred to as "the Rothschilds of the East," plays a leading role in this history. A wealthy Jewish merchant, Sassoon fled from Baghdad in 1832 and established the house of David Sassoon & Co., gaining enormous wealth through the opium trade and building a trading operation that extended to China, Japan, Africa and eastern Europe.

In terms of population, Bombay's Jewish community reached its peak around 1947, just as both India and the State of Israel were about to declare their independence. The community was then about 30,000-strong, but afterward dwindled precipitously to only a few thousand or perhaps even fewer.

Sapir was born in Bombay to a locally born mother and a father born in Rangoon, Burma: one can imagine that growing up Jewish in such a place, with such an ancestry, must have been a rather exotic experience. He left while still a child and returned decades later to revisit all the sites of his middle-class childhood.

The book features sections on the historical background, synagogues, schools, hospitals, Jewish-run banks, industry, office buildings and residences of note, and much more. There are coloured photographs on practically every page and plenty of detailed maps.

The book may offer more information than many of us will require, except perhaps those who know the city or are planning a trip there. For many readers, the rich visuals and captions will be enough. Sapir has been a teacher of historical geography at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem since 1975.

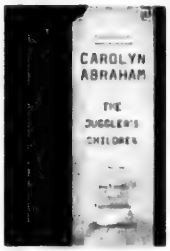
The Juggler's Children
Carolyn Abraham
Random House Canada

The late eminent American genealogist Rabbi Malcolm Stern once observed that there is nothing so fascinating to a person as his own genealogical research, and often nothing so boring as being stuck at a dinner table with a family-tree enthusiast who insists upon endlessly discussing their latest research.

With her recent book The Juggler's Children: A Journey into Family, Legend and the Genes That Bind Us, Toronto writer Carolyn Abraham gives us an account of her personal genealogical explorations, fuelled by scientific examination of her family's DNA, that never stops being fascinating. A former science writer for the Globe and Mail, Abraham also delivers a set of clear explanations of chromosomal markers, haploid groups, genetic mutations and other scientific terms intrinsic to understanding the huge emerging science surrounding human DNA.

Born in England of diverse and somewhat mysterious ancestry, Abraham focuses her investigations on two great-grandfathers: her father's paternal grandfather who came (from China) to the remote Nilgiri Hills region of southern India and was known as a juggler before he disappeared, and her mother's paternal grandfather, a sea-captain from Jamaica who also settled in India and died at a young age.

At school, her friends were curious "about a brown girl with a Jewish last name who went to the Catholic school," but Abraham couldn't answer their simple questions about her ethnicity and roots. As a young adult, she paid a rare visit to her grandfather in England and had an astounding revelation: "I saw something instantly familiar and yet utterly foreign in his face, in the gentle slant of his eyes. He looked Chinese. I was dumbstruck. My grandfather was Chinese? We were Chinese?"



An elderly great-aunt, discovered living in the Nilgiri Hills at age 103, is interviewed; potential relatives in a grandmother's old address book are telephoned; visits are paid to potential cousins in Jamaica and India; and old cemeteries and church records are combed through. In these and other ways, Abraham conducts a thorough, traditional genealogical investigation.

Yet she goes one giant step further by taking cheek swabs from various close family members and distant relatives in order to see what secrets their DNA – "biological mementos" from our ancestors – will reveal. Sometimes the results only confirm the obvious, but they also provide dramatic surprises such as the so-called "false paternity" or "pedigree error." (Incredibly, geneticists assert that roughly one in 10 people were "not fathered by the man they believed to be Dad.")

Amidst her colourful, non-technical scientific descriptions, Abraham describes the work of Toronto researcher Karl Svorecki who discovered that Jewish men from the priestly "Kohan" tribe, regardless of geographic origin, do indeed carry a specific set of mutations on their Y chromosomes (originally reported in the British medical journal Nature in 1997).

She also introduces us to many other leading figures in the modern DNA-related scientific community. These include Houston businessman Bennett Greenspan, who founded the pioneering firm Family Tree DNA, and American geneticist Michael Hammer, who helped determine that a Bantu-speaking tribe in southern Africa called the Lemba were descended from a small group of ancient Jews. (The Lemba still practise certain Jewish customs such as circumcision, keeping Shabbat, and not eating pig-like animals such as the hippopotamus.)

The Juggler's Children tells us as much about the author's particular and exotic family-tree saga as it does about ourselves and the unravelling modern science of DNA. It is well-written, informative, and an honest-to-goodness page-turner.

Congratulations!

Toronto filmmakers document Romani Holocaust

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

The chilling stories ring familiar even to the casual student of the Holocaust: Deportations, beatings, cattle cars, torture, mass shootings, tattooed forearms.

Except these are not Jews speaking, but members of today's most persecuted ethnic group in Europe.

The Roma, commonly, though not always pejoratively, referred to as Gypsies, even have their own word for it. They may cite the "Holocaust," as many other non-Jewish survivors do, but their term for their war-era nightmare is "Porrajmos," meaning "devouring." It can also mean "rape."

Once stereotyped as hot-blooded musicians and fortune-tellers, and romanticized as Europe's noble savages, Europe's 12-15 million Roma and their subgroups today face brutal discrimination in housing, jobs and education. In many countries, they are ghettoized, denied services, face physical violence and pushed to the margins.

They are then vilified as thieves and vagrants.

During World War II, they were portrayed as less than human, lumped with Jews as parasites worthy of extermination. "Our ashes were mingled in the ovens," goes one Roma proverb.

How widely known is the Roma experience during the war and today in Europe? Generally, not too much, which is why A People Uncounted is so welcome.

The powerful 100-minute documentary, made by a Canadian – mostly Jewish – crew, premiered in 2012 and has already won a few awards (and has been nominated for a prestigious Producers Guild of America prize). It's entered in some 35 film festivals in over a dozen countries, including India and China.

It was screened at Toronto's Lodzer Synagogue on March 30.

Moody, thorough and hard-hitting, the film travels to eight eastern European countries to record the testimonies of Roma (or Romani) Holocaust survivors. It's hair-raising stuff, and the filmmakers do not pull their punch. We hear horrific tales of sadistic rape at Auschwitz, a baby and its mother trampled in a cattle car, even of cannibalism. It's a wonder that only a few subjects break down on camera.

The work is the effort of Toronto filmmakers Tom Rasky and Len Binder, both children of Jewish Holocaust survivors; director Aaron Yeger; and Robi Botos, a Roma musician who fled Hungary to Toronto years ago.

Music, in fact, was a great connector between Roma and Jews in the war era, the film notes. It shows a Roma violinist in Ukraine expertly playing the Yiddish song Mein Shtetele Belz.

Efforts to eradicate the Roma and related groups like the Sinti go back well before the Nazis, apparently to the time of Vlad the Impaler in the 15th century. The film traces the roots of the persecution through the centuries, and its echoes of the Jewish experience are striking.

"One of the biggest things I took away from the process is that there isn't a fundamental difference between people," Yeger, 31, said in an interview. As one expert told the filmmakers, though the remark was edited out, the Jews were the outsiders on the inside, while the Roma were the outsiders on the outside.

The two groups "suffered in similar ways, struggled against ethnic nationalism and particularly in some regions, were very close to one another," Yeger said.

He and a crew spent six weeks on a "road trip" shooting the privately-funded film. We also hear interviews with experts on genocide, including Prof. Frank Chalk, director of the Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies at Concordia University.

A Roma woman displays her concentration camp tattoo in this still from A People Uncounted. As many as 500,000 to two million Roma died in the Holocaust.

It's difficult to say how many Roma and Sinti perished in the Holocaust. Though the film gives the number as 500,000, The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum says it's 220,000, while some experts put the figure as high as two million.

Yeger prefers to see the destruction visited on the Roma another way: In some places, 90 per cent of them were wiped out.

Today, the Roma are subject to "what is unfortunately socially acceptable and politically correct racism," Yeger said. "Politicians and journalists speak about Roma in a way that they would never speak about any other group that I can think of."

He feels the Roma's plight is self-fulfilling: "If you reduce people's access to education, jobs, [and] justice, they fall into poverty, they resort to lifestyles that then reinforce what pushed them to the margins in the first place, and on and on the cycle goes," said Yeger. "The Roma are still perceived as this permanently itinerant, anti-social group that's mysterious and chooses to exile themselves from mainstream society, which is absolutely not true."

One misconception is that they're nomadic. The vast majority are settled, we are told. And while some of the Roma traditional lifestyle and culture has been preserved, as in Transylvania, for the most part, that part of their identity is gone to history.

Unlike the Jews, the Romani have few resources to address the systemic racism they continue to face. In the city of Kosice, Slovakia, we see they are herded into a squalid ghetto called District 9, and receive water twice a day.

The film, said its director, is "the story of a group of people who are not different from any other people, but are eternally perceived to be radically different. The vast majority in every country just want to live normal productive lives, like anybody else."

WORLD'S OLDEST HOLOCAUST SURVIVOR SUBJECT OF AWARD-WINNING DOCUMENTARY

Alice Herz-Sommer

The Lady in Number 6 – Music Saved My Life, a 38-minute Canadian documentary film that won an Academy Award, will receive its Toronto premiere April 13 at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC.

Winner of the best documentary short subject category, the film tells the story of Alice Herz-Sommer, who was the world's oldest pianist and Holocaust survivor. She shares her views on how to live a long and happy life and discusses music, laughter and how to remain optimistic come what may.

The film was shot in her central London flat where she relentlessly played her grand piano well into her 110th year. Although she was reticent at first to play for the cameras, she overcame her shyness, and her immense talent is showcased with "a little bit of Bach." Sadly, Herz-Sommer died on Feb. 23, one week prior to the Oscars.

During World War II, Herz-Sommer and her son Raphael were taken to the Theresienstadt concentration camp, while her mother and husband were taken to Auschwitz and Dachau, where they perished. As a means to survive the terrors of the camp, Alice played more than 100 concerts for her fellow inmates. "Music saved my life and music saves me still," she used to say.

Tickets ($10, cash only) are available at the door before each of four screenings, 12:30, 2:30, 4:30 and 6:30 p.m. Director Malcolm Clarke and executive producer Frederic Bohbot will participate in a Q&A following each screening.

Names in the News: For the past four years, acclaimed Toronto author David Bezmozgis (Natasha, The Free World) has been writing a novel set in present-day Crimea. While The Betrayers is still slated for publication this September, Bezmozgis is faced with making dramatic changes because the story can no longer be set in the summer of 2014 as he had intended.

As he mused in a recent blog for The New Yorker, he did not expect recent political events to undermine his designs for the book; that was something one might expect about Israel, he wrote, but not about Crimea, which had not been so prominently in the news "since Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill met in Yalta to divide up postwar Europe." He'd reasonably assumed Ukraine and Crimea "to be locked in a dismal kleptocratic stasis."

For Bezmozgis, the experience serves as a demonstration that the modern novelist can no longer pretend to keep pace with social and political changes around the world: information travels too fast, and "the clock continues to tick, threatening obsolescence." Can the modern novel engage with "the grander social and political phenomena of our times, especially now that it competes with a rushing stream of up-to-the-minute reporting?" he asks.

Publisher Little Brown and Co. has locked the book into a production schedule but has given the author until June to make changes to his manuscript. "Clearly, the only choice is to take it back to the summer of 2013," Bezmozgis commented in a post-blog interview, "which is something I resisted all along for other reasons that have to do with the novel." Come rain, shine, war or revolution, The Betrayers is due for release next Sept. 23.

Re-imagining a Jewish homeland in New York

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

It's been almost two centuries since the prominent American Jew Mordecai Manual Noah attempted to establish a homeland and refuge for the beleaguered Jews of the world in, of all places, Grand Island, N.Y.

Noah went so far as to lay a cornerstone in 1825 for the intended nation of Ararat, named after the spot where the biblical Noah's ark landed. However, the world's Jews failed to notice and Ararat was relegated to near-oblivion, a quirky episode in the saga of Jewish nationalism before Zionism caught on at the end of the 19th century.

Ararat has been the subject of many historical articles and several books, most notably Ben Katchor's 1999 graphic novel, The Jew of New York. Renewed attention has been paid to the story recently due to the efforts of Toronto-based artist Melissa Shiff, who has spearheaded a "Mapping Ararat" project to bring a new level of realism to Noah's near-forgotten dream.

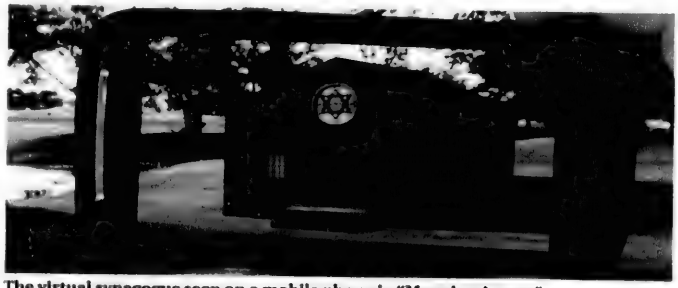
Using an app on their iPods or iPhones, visitors to the Grand Island site, near the corner of Whitehaven and East River roads may use their devices to see various imagined elements of Ararat – including a flag, port of entry, cornerstone and synagogue – inserted into the landscape. Plaques and video and audio files pop up, offering more information as visitors approach each element.

Shiff, who recently gave some group tours at the site, draws a parallel to the literary genre of alternate or "counter-factual" histories as employed by Philip Roth in The Plot Against America and Michael Chabon in The Yiddish Policeman's Union which takes place in an invented Jewish homeland in Alaska.

"In the literary world it's quite an established form, but in the visual art world, it really isn't," Shiff said, adding that in the art world, it's rare for an augmented reality project to be as extensive as Mapping Ararat. The project was conceived by Shiff and supported by a $62,000 grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada (SSHRC). The creative team also included her husband Louis Kaplan, who, like Shiff, is an academic at the University of Toronto, and technological adviser John Craig Freeman.

Living in New York for a year while Kaplan is on sabbatical there, Shiff and her team have lectured about the project "non-stop" at academic conferences and other gatherings, she said. She and Kaplan were keynote speakers at a recent conference at Rutgers University on contested memory.

Mapping Ararat "appeals to many different circles," she said. "You have the technofiles who want to hear about such an extensive project – a lot of augmented reality projects are not extensive like this; I think this is the first project of this kind that has this kind of scope. It also links into Jewish history circles and comparative literature circles and ethnographic circles. There are many communities that are interested in it."

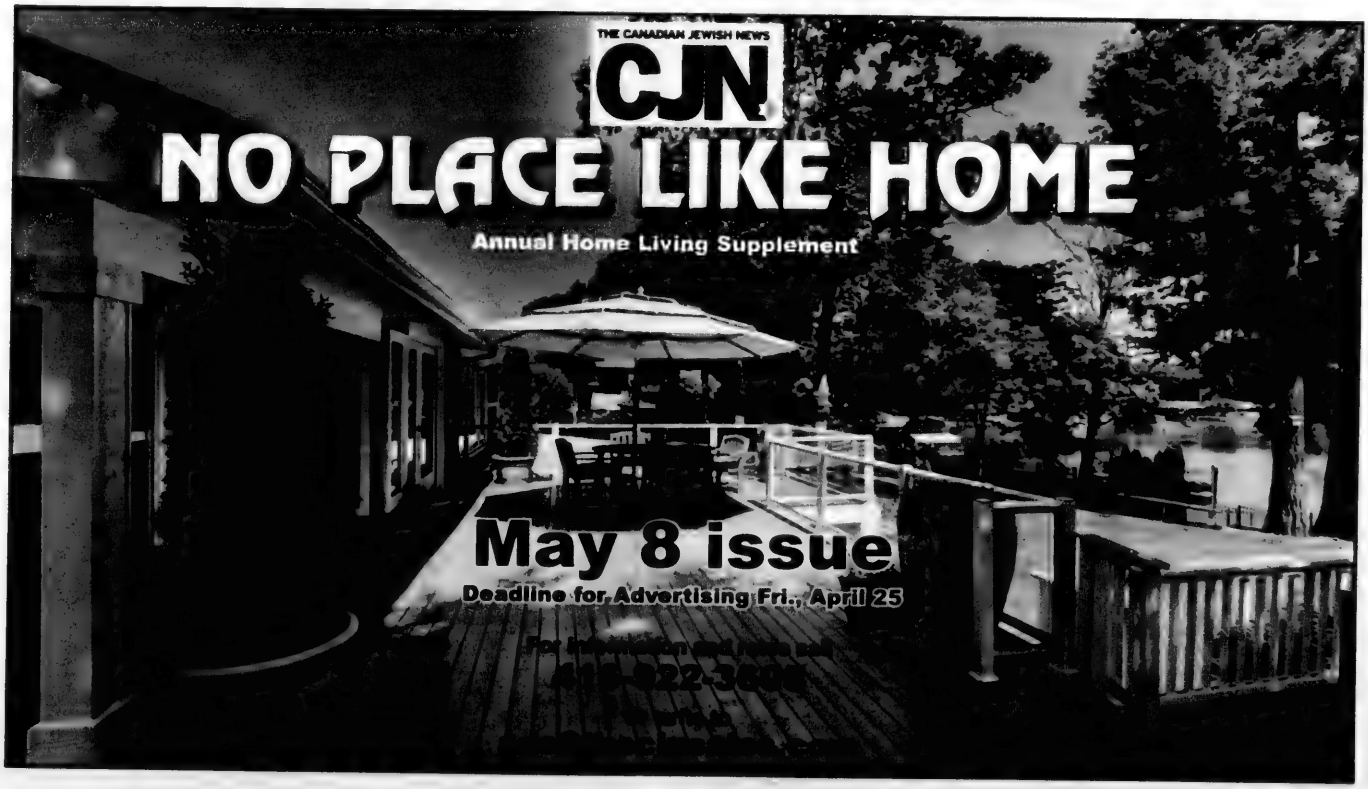


The virtual synagogue seen on a mobile phone in "Mapping Ararat."

While the funding for the project runs out in May, Shiff has already applied to SSHRC for new funding for more such projects. "The subtitle of the project is 'Imaginary Jewish Homelands,' so we're certainly considering other proposed homelands," she said. While Alaska, where Chabon's novel is set, won't be one of them, other potential localities include Suriname and the Kimberley and Tasmania region of Western Australia.

Besides the architectural renderings, Shiff has also designed a range of pop-culture pieces as if history had taken a bizarre turn and Ararat had actually come into existence. They include a postage stamp, postcards, movie poster and an Ararat dollar bill.

Might not someone possibly mistake one of these invented items as a real artifact? "Oh, that's already happened," she acknowledged with a laugh. "They were inducting Mordecai Noah into the American Jewish Hall of Fame and they happened to come across the dollar bill I designed, and they wanted to know if it was real."



Screenwriter finally has his Hollywood ending

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

It is a story worthy of an Oscar-winning screenplay: a devoted writer spends 16 years trying to break into the film business and finally makes it.

It is a tale filled with struggle and conflict, as well as the occasional plot twist. However, nearly two decades after entering film school at York University, Thornhill, Ont. scribe Shane Weisfeld finally has something of a Hollywood ending.

"I'm actually glad that things have been happening for me all these years later, instead of my early 20s when I expected things to happen," Weisfeld said. "I've got all these years of experience behind me. These years of discipline and practice definitely helped."

Weisfeld's first produced screenplay is Freezer, a thriller he co-wrote with longtime friend Tom Doganoglu. Freezer had a brief theatrical run and debuted in on-demand formats in January across North America. For two weeks, it was one of the top ten independent movies on iTunes.

The thriller stars The Practice's Dylan McDermott as a mechanic trapped in a meat freezer who must return $8 million to the Russian mob before he freezes to death. The film was also one of more than a dozen screenplays that Weisfeld wrote on his journey from film buff to produced writer.

Weisfeld became interested in pursuing film in his last years of high school after doing a report on the '80s classic The Karate Kid.

"I thought in order to be in the film industry, I have to go to film school," he says, hoping that would help him break into the industry right away. "Little did I know, it doesn't always work out that way."

At York, Weisfeld was exposed to world cinema and became infatuated with the art form. Between classes, he would spend time in the university's film library catching up on the classics. In December 1997, his final year in the film program, he actively started to query agents and producers to read his first feature script.

It was close to 15 years of "No" before a manager said "Yes" to one of his stories.

Many of his scripts were thrillers and dramas, although Weisfeld also wrote a hip-hop comedy based on his own experiences as a rap artist. Weisfeld says he was a fan of that musical genre since he was eight, back when hip-hop was in its infancy, and was known for performing gigs in high school.

While over a decade of constant writing without success could deter others, Weisfeld says it was not hard for him to stay motivated, since writing is inherent to who he is.

"I actually get motivated by reading about deals that writers make and success that writers have," he says. "It's not something I'm turned off by. I never say, 'Oh, why do they get to be successful and not me?' I love reading that stuff. It means that the [film] business is healthy… that people are always looking for great material."

Shane Weisfeld

Some of the lessons that Weisfeld has for those interested in making it as a screenwriter:

• Make the time to write and do so every day. Weisfeld says he tries to write whenever he has free time. "The most important thing is to stay consistent, so even if it's only for 20 minutes every day or a small scene every day, that's OK."

• Read interviews with screenwriters and learn from the masters. "Don't try to emulate their writing but emulate their successful habits," he says.

• Do not try to sell a screenplay until it is as good as it can be. Re-writing is more important than writing. "Just when you think it can't get better, it can. Trust me."

• Who you know is less important than how well you write. "A lot of writers are under the assumption… that you break into the business because you know somebody. What's going to break you in is a great script."

He cites writer/director David Mamet, who has written many books about the creative process, as a major influence. Weisfeld is also a fan of American independent maven John Sayles (Eight Men Out), as well as Robert Towne (Chinatown), Aaron Sorkin (The Social Network) and Steve Zaillian (Schindler's List).

During his prolonged creative period before getting a single writing credit, Weisfeld, now 39, began a blog. On Unsolicited: A Screenwriter's 16-Year Journey Into the Film Industry, he gives advice to aspiring scribes. Weisfeld says he wants to turn the posts into a book about his experiences and the lessons he learned.

Weisfeld is now writing a thriller that takes place on an African safari, as well as re-working another script. However, even with one produced credit, screenwriting is not Weisfeld's full-time job – yet.

"I'm still facing rejections. I'm still making mistakes. I'm still learning how to re-write my stuff and going back and making it great," he says. "No matter what, it's always going to be a learning process."

A kosher chicken on every seder table?

NCJWC-TS aims to put a bird in every food box

CJN Staff

Is a seder still a seder without chicken?

That's the question many in the Jewish community have been asking since the Passover food drive kicked off.

The issue of whether the recipients are going to get a kosher chicken with their food box this year has been strongly debated at National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section (NCJWC-TS), because donated kosher chickens have always been part of the food drive delivery.

The recipients are among the neediest in our community. So, we have been asking if we can afford to purchase chickens this year, now that our donor is no longer in business. Almost 90 per cent of the food packed for delivery is purchased with donated funds, and this is an additional large expense.

The community has been discussing "the chickens" – the rabbis and community leaders have talked to their communities about what a loss this would be for those who depend on their box for Passover food.

As a result, the decision was made to purchase almost 2,000 kosher chickens for delivery day, April 6, and the order has been placed.

Council is confident that the generosity of the community will cover this expense, Passover food drive chair Glenda Ephron Cooper said.

She said people have been phoning non-stop to express their concern and make donations. "The public has been fantastic... Our very first supporter for this extra purchase was Terra Landscaping in Toronto, who made a very generous donation toward the chicken fund."

She added that Council has faith in the Toronto community, and "we just hope to get enough monetary donations to pay for this added financial load of purchasing the chickens." To make a donation, please call 416-633-5100, go to www.ncjwc-ts.org or www.canadahelps.org/dn/171233

In 1982, the Passover food drive, a project of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section, responded to the necessity to support the more needy members of the community during Passover. They packed and delivered 25 boxes. This year, they will be packing and delivering almost 2,500 boxes. Recipients are referred through various social agencies in the GTA.

Playing to win

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

I was at home when my phone buzzed with a text from my son. He was playing for the school basketball team in a city an hour away, and his five words carried disappointment and sadness. "I'm just a benchwarmer, mom."

I'm not one of those parents who cheers on sports games from the sidelines. Perhaps I'm still scarred from high school athletics, when my best friend and I were consistently the last members picked for any team during gym classes, a painful memory to this day. It sounds callous, but for me, sports has never held even a glimmer of interest, not even when my own children are playing.

But something changed when I learned my son had spent most of that game on the bench watching instead of playing. What upset me was the injustice of his exclusion. He'd attended practices dutifully and loved being part of the team – until that game. "I'm not a bad player," he insisted. "I don't know why they didn't let me play."

The indignation of having been left out hung around the house like a damp cloud for a few days. I felt hurt on his behalf, compelled to try and make things right. So I did what any writer-parent would do: I penned a letter to the principal.

"It wasn't fair," I declared. "I was under the impression that in team sports, everyone gets a turn. How could the coach exclude certain players and justify that exclusion by the team's victory? Wasn't the victory hollow when only the best players had performed?"

"We don't guarantee that every player will get to play," the principal responded. "Sure, they can get a place on the team. But it's the coach's decision about who plays the games. And we play to win."

A friend explained it better a few days later. In elementary school, the games are all about playing fair, giving everyone a turn and learning to be a good sport. Not so in high school, where the emphasis shifts to winning.

"The weaker players sit on the bench so the team can have its best shot at victory," she said. "That's just the way it is, regardless which sport we're talking about."

I was astonished, but enlightened, too. As parents, we want desperately to defend our kids from insults, bruised egos and perceived injustices. Their hurt becomes our hurt, and we feel compelled, angered even, to speak out on their behalf.

But perhaps sitting on the bench offers some important life lessons, such as the humility to admit you're not the strongest player, the insight that you need to work harder to be chosen for the next game, and the understanding that as unifying as the word "team" appears to be, it's composed of members who are not equally competent. You either shine, or be outshone.

It's going to be the same scenario at every job interview a few years down the line. The strongest candidates will be selected, while the rest will warm the bench on the sidelines until they improve their game.

So maybe warming a bench for a few games is a crucial part of the game itself, in that it deftly illustrates the distance between where you are and where you want to be. It's what you do with that knowledge that makes all the difference, on the basketball court and off.

Top Chef judge shares macaroon recipe

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

When asked about her stellar rise to fame, Gail Simmons, a celebrity judge on the reality show Top Chef, says the stars were aligned when she started out as a food critic.

The Toronto native was at the right place at the right time. "I could never have predicted this career. I happened to come of age when food and pop culture intersected."

She attributes this "food revolution" to the creation of the Food Network: through the television exposure, chefs and culinary experts became media stars.

This year, Simmons, 37, is adding some glitter to the Canadian reality competitive cooking show, Recipes to Riches, which features home cooks. She is one of three judges who will decide which recipe will win the $250,000 prize. The contest's grand finale airs April 2 at 9 p.m. on CBC.

"I was thrilled do a project for the CBC," says Simmons, who has been living in New York City for the last 15 years. "What I love about the show is that it is so Canadian. The stories and the food are wonderful."

And she has enjoyed working with her fellow judges. "We have such a good time together. You never know how the chemistry will work."

Judging home cooks is a very different experience than the professional chefs she is accustomed to on Top Chef, she says.

She has been with the show since its first season in 2006, and she was the lead critic on the spinoff, Top Chef: Just Desserts, which ran in 2010 and 2011. She also works as a special projects director for Food & Wine magazine and is a regular on American network television shows. "I am often invited to talk about the latest food trends," she says.

In December, she took on a new role – motherhood – when she and her husband, Jeremy Abrams, who's originally from Montreal, welcomed their daughter, Dahlia Rae.

Simmons traces her interest in food to her mother, Renee Simmons, a culinary expert in her own right. She ran a cooking school out of her home and she wrote a food column for the Globe and Mail in the late '70s and early '80s.

"Food always played a big part in our home. My mother cooked seven days a week. Everything was fresh and homemade. My mother was ahead of her time."

When Simmons was a student at McGill University, she wrote restaurant reviews for a campus newspaper, and when she graduated, she got an internship as a food writer and restaurant critic at Toronto Life. "My mother tried to discourage me from having a career in food... I was always drawn to food criticism."

Gail Simmons

She left Toronto for New York in 1999 to attend the Institute of Culinary Education. For the last 10 years, she has been working for Food & Wine. When the idea for Top Chef was conceived, Bravo approached the magazine, she recalls. "The network wanted us to help promote the show."

At the time, there were no shows about celebrity chefs, she says. "Nobody was doing a serious food show about professional chefs.

"Food & Wine sent me do a screen test. It was frightening. I was already doing television. I was going on talk shows to talk about whatever we had in upcoming issues of the magazine.

"I was very nervous. So many reality shows had failed. Television is so fickle. It was a big risk."

Eight years later, the show is still very popular and it has been renewed for a 12th season. Top Chef has garnered many Emmy Award nominations, and in 2003, it won for the best reality competition show. There have also been spinoffs like Top Chef: Just Desserts and Top Chef Masters.

Two years ago, Simmons published her first book, Eating with My Mouth Full: My Life as a Professional Eater (Hyperion, 2012). She says the book focuses on what it's like to work in food media. There's even a section on how she maintains her weight, because it's a question she gets asked very frequently.

She says she takes care of herself by working out regularly, eating healthy food, and when she is judging the chefs, she only tries a small portion of their food. "I don't eat every thing on my plate. In New York, I walk everywhere. There's a real culture of walking."

Despite her busy television schedule, Simmons continues to work for Food & Wine. "I represent the magazine to the media and I work with various chefs on a variety of projects.

"I am now a brand ambassador for Food & Wine. I love the magazine and all the people I work with."

TOASTED CHOCOLATE COCONUT MACAROONS

Simmons and her husband usually go to Montreal for Passover. They spend Rosh Hashanah in Toronto with her parents, Renee and Ivor Simmons, her two siblings and their families. Below, Simmons shares her recipe for chocolate macaroons, one of her favourite Passover desserts.

3 egg whites
1/2 tsp. cream of tartar
1 tbsp. sugar
1 14-oz. can kosher for Passover sweetened condensed milk (recipe below)
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tsp. lemon zest
20 oz. sweetened shredded coconut
7 oz. dark chocolate (60-70% cocoa), coarsely chopped

Preheat oven to 325. Beat egg whites in an electric mixer on low. Once whites are broken up, add cream of tartar and sugar. Increase speed to medium and beat until whites are frothy.

Shut off mixer and fold in condensed milk, vanilla and lemon zest. Add coconut and mix until well incorporated. Let mixture sit for 2-3 minutes. Line 2 cookie sheets with parchment paper. Drop 12 heaping tablespoons of the batter on each tray, spacing them apart evenly. Bake for 20-25 minutes. Let cool. Melt chocolate in a double boiler over low heat or in the microwave. Dip half of each macaroon into the chocolate. Place on tray and allow chocolate to set. Serve when cooled. Makes 24 cookies.

KOSHER FOR PASSOVER CONDENSED MILK

If you can't find kosher for Passover condensed milk, which would be milk that is not sweetened with corn syrup or barley malt, you can make your own.

The following Internet recipe, a substitution for 1-1/4 cups sweetened condensed milk, comes from Pesach Recipe Substitutes on the Orthodox Union (OU) website.

1 cup instant nonfat dry milk
2/3 cup sugar
1/3 cup boiling water
3 tbsp. margarine

Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.

SUPERMODEL SATISFIES MUPPET, AIRLINE LEAVES VIOLINIST HANGING

Bar Refaeli too hot for Israeli TV

A campaign ad for fashion brand Hoodies, starring Israeli supermodel Bar Rafaeli and a muppet known as Red Orbach, made waves last week after being deemed too risqué for daytime television audiences in Israel. In the spot, Orbach fantasizes about multiple sexual encounters with the blonde bombshell, and it ends with the tagline "It couldn't get any better than this. Or could it?" According to a ruling by censors for Israel's Second Authority for Television and Radio, there were just "too many sexual insinuations" for the spot to run before 10 p.m. Maybe Red was showing too much chest hair.

Perlman gets Air Canada apology

Air Canada apologized last week to Israeli-American violinist Itzhak Perlman and donated 500,000 Aeroplan miles to Chai Lifeline, which supports families of kids with serious illnesses, after an airline employee abandoned the disabled virtuoso with his luggage, crutches and violin. The man met Perlman to help him as he deplaned at Toronto's Pearson Airport, but left him on an elevator to fend for himself and make his way to customs and immigration. Perlman had polio as a child and uses crutches and a mobility scooter to get around. He was in Toronto to play a benefit for Chai Lifeline. For our report on the concert, please see page 15.

Was it good for you? Bar Refaeli and her felt friend revel in simulated post-coital bliss.

Did Trudeau really say that?

Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau played defence last week after Winnipeg Tory MP Joyce Bateman accused him of taking a more "balanced line" on the Middle East, "signifying a shift away from support for Israel"and "opposing our efforts to defend [Israel's] right to exist and to a Jewish homeland." Trudeau supposedly made the remarks to Iranian newspaper Salam Toronto last month, and the comments made news in Israel, where right-leaning Arutz Sheva said he accused Prime Minister Stephen Harper of "pandering to the Jewish vote." Trudeau countered that he hadn't made the comments, but that he told the paper he favoured reinstating ties with Iran, which Harper ended, and accused Harper of developing foreign policy based on electoral concerns. ■

Letters to the Editor

Looking for seder memories

I am working on a project that I hope eventually will become an anthology of stories people retell from their family seders.

I want to get stories about mishaps, surprises, discussions, humorous events and so on. I know whenever I get together with people at seders, we always talk about seders we have attended in the past, why we remember them and we exchange some very entertaining, vivid tales.

I was wondering if The CJN's readers might like to contribute to my project. Their stories can be submitted anonymously if they prefer.

Please contact me by email: pawsawhile@eastlink.ca, or call 709-481-2043.

Thanks to WordSwap

My husband and I had the honour of hosting three of the eight WordSwap members for Shabbat dinner ("Israeli Arabs help to debunk apartheid myths," The CJN, March 20). Rabea, Muhamed and Ortal volunteered to leave their very full and busy student lives to come to Canada and help our students stand up to the anti-Semitism and lies that they face on campus.

Druze, Jew, Bedouin – it doesn't matter for this group of pro-Israel advocates. In fact, it's their diversity that helps demonstrate to the ignorant hatemongers on campus how wrong they are about Israel.

I want to thank all the members of WordSwap for their enthusiasm and dedication to Israel (and our students). I trust that next year, StandWithUs will be able to obtain the fundraising required to bring this group back for a third year.

Sadly, there is much to do. Thankfully, we have WordSwap to help us.

Women saying Kaddish

I found myself in the midst of quite an emotional, empathetic reaction when reading Norma Baumel Joseph's article about saying Kaddish ("Saying Kaddish again, but still invisible," The CJN, March 20). As a contributor to the recent book, Kaddish, Women's Voices, by Michal Smart and Barbara Ashkenas, which won the National Jewish Book Award, I have had mixed experiences on the "other side of the mechitza" when saying Kaddish.

Though it has been many years since my parents died, my recitation of Kaddish, now at yahrzeits, depending on where it is said, has received "mixed reviews".

It indeed both saddens and angers me that, as far as we have come in modern day Judaism, and with the knowledge that it is indeed perfectly acceptable for a woman to say Kaddish, there still remain people (of both genders) who see a need to demean and diminish not only women's observance, but also their feelings, particularly of grief, when it comes to saying Kaddish in the presence of a minyan.

In knowing that there is indeed a lot of grey area where many have seen black and white, the minhagim (customs – and they are indeed customs and not necessarily Jewish law) surrounding Kaddish and mourning (and other practices) have become structured strictures instead of opportunities for growth and grieving.

I suppose what struck me hardest was Joseph's acknowledgement that she is next. I share in that disconcerting feeling. I do truly hope that, in the example I set, my own children (I have two daughters, as well as a son) will find it somehow more comfortable to say Kaddish at the appropriate time.

May more and more women take the role of setting the example of grieving through the recitation of Kaddish and other practices, as there is indeed healing to be found there, so the women who come next might have it just a bit easier.

Bernie Madoff's identity

When the Bernie Madoff story hit the news, everybody was aware of his identity as a Jew ("No betrayal: Madoff," The CJN, March 27). When the people who were victimized by Madoff turned out disproportionately to be Jews, I said a silent thank you prayer, as did many Jews. The anti-Semites would have shouted that the Jews were victimizing the gentiles again.

Through the generations
...a sacred trust

PESACH

At the sedar table we relive the deeds of our ancestors as though we ourselves had been there. Thus are the generations bridged, the past propelling us into the future with a renewed sense of purpose, and commitment... one that we accept as a sacred trust.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Celebrating freedom at the seder

Passover recalls our liberation, but how do you make it meaningful and delicious without running yourself ragged?

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: One of the biggest challenges Jewish educators have is making Judaism relevant to children. How do we give them a seder experience that's both enriching and entertaining, one that will make them proud to be Jewish and want to learn and do more? What works for you, your family and your congregants, Rabbi Grushcow?

Rabbi Grushcow: I've always loved the rabbinic teaching that the seder table can be set upside down, so that when participants see it, they're immediately engaged with questions. The very format of the seder is conducive to the aspects of Judaism that modern Jews treasure: questioning and conversation, an appreciation for history and story, and good food. Anything that helps deliver the essential message of Pesach – that we began in degradation and slavery and emerged into freedom – is powerful. We have a tradition of asking each guest to bring something that signifies freedom for them. People have brought their conversion certificates, passports and running shoes. Once, a young girl spoke about learning to read and write. It's a great conversation starter and a great equalizer. The seder is most effective when everyone feels they have a place at the table.

Rabbi Korobkin: In our home, no two seders are ever the same, since we try to cater the flow to our guests. When it's just family, the challenge is catering to different ages: for our six-year old, we'll have plastic frogs hopping around the table. For adult children, we'll set aside time after the small kids are asleep to have them present more complex divrei Torah. Other times, we host unaffiliated Jews who are sometimes having their first traditional seder at our home. In those situations, we'll read mostly in English, discuss the Exodus on a very basic level, and try to cater to their level of education. When we lived in Los Angeles, our African-American neighbours once joined us, and we spent a large portion of the seder on the verse, "Our ancestors were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt." We discovered a history and language of liberation common to both our cultures. In the end, we try to make everyone feel comfortable, welcome and free to say or question whatever they like.

Rabbi Grushcow: It does sound like our seders have a lot in common! When I'm teaching about Pesach, I find my students – especially those who weren't born Jewish – appreciate that Judaism is a religion that doesn't just take place in the synagogue. Family recipes are part of what make the seder so powerful for me and part of what we talk about with guests. But the cooking and home preparation make Pesach our most labour-intensive holiday. Even as a child, I was struck by the irony that the festival of freedom involved so much work. How do you make the seder a meaningful and delicious experience of freedom for both guests and hosts?

Rabbi Korobkin: It's not an easy balance. In a seder class I gave to a group of ladies, many of whom were dreading pre-Pesach efforts, I noted that if those preparing are exhausted by the time they start the seder, it's not really possible to fulfil its primary mitzvah: "In every generation a person is obligated to view himself or herself as if they are now leaving Egypt." Many people go to such extremes in cleaning that it's easy to lose the forest for the trees. I remind people that Pesach cleaning is about making sure all chametz has been put away and sold, and that the house gets a thorough cleaning. No more, no less. This is one reason that years ago, I took it upon myself to kasher the house and do a large amount of the cooking before Pesach, because it's important that my wife not get stressed out by a holiday that's about liberation. As long as we put cleaning into perspective and preparation is a team effort, we can manage without too much stress.

Rabbi Grushcow: For me, the work is mitigated in some ways by a feeling of connection. Most important, we never want the perfect to be the enemy of the good. It's impossible to make exactly the same seder one's parents or grandparents made. And for those who are new to Judaism or Jewish practice, the image of the ideal seder can be daunting. What matters is coming together, eating, and telling the story. The perfect chicken soup is wonderful, but you can still have a seder without it. ■

Ultra-Orthodox Jews collect water from a mountain spring outside Jerusalem on April 6. The water will be used to make matzah.

From the Editor's Desk

Where do peace talks go from here?

Last week's breakdown in peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians was discouraging. Nevertheless, there are lessons to be learned.

Firstly, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry has failed to inspire confidence in either side – or in anyone – that he can broker a deal. He has been completely ineffective, and it's time Barack Obama found someone new to take on a mediator's role. And while we're on the subject of the U.S. president, he has yet to show he possesses the fortitude to orchestrate a serious peace process. He's running out of time to do so.

Maybe I'm being too harsh on Kerry and Obama. After all, they have the misfortune of attempting to work with Mahmoud Abbas, a man who clearly doesn't understand the concept of give and take. The Palestinian Authority president's refusal to accept Israel as a Jewish state effectively ended these negotiations. Unless and until the Palestinians are willing to acknowledge the most basic principle of Israel's existence – that it is the Jewish homeland – there is no peace deal to talk about. Quite the opposite: when Abbas signed on to 15 United Nations treaties and conventions last week, he signalled a renewed offensive against Israel. Why should anyone believe he is a genuine peace partner?

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his negotiating team don't come out of this looking particularly strong, either. The decision to delay the release of Palestinian (and a few Israeli-Arab) prisoners in hopes of extracting a promise of further negotiations did not end well. Abbas' rigidity on the Jewish-state issue and his refusal to commit to continuing talks beyond the end of April certainly put Israeli leaders in a tough spot – but reneging on the prisoner transfer ultimately gave Abbas an opening to apply to the UN.

What happens next is anyone's guess. The Palestinians might play hardball and move the fight to the UN. Then again, given that they managed to wrench away more prisoners from Israel and attain greater status at the UN during these peace talks, all without giving up anything, perhaps they will think they have reason to come back to the table. A renewed terror campaign is less likely, but the possibility can't be overlooked.

Meanwhile, Israeli negotiators have every reason to be frustrated by the unreasonable expectations being heaped on them from all sides. Still, they will have to find a way to move forward.

As for the Americans, Kerry and Obama have each signalled they are growing impatient with the two sides. Clearly, the feeling is mutual.

This much we do know: the majority of Israelis want to talk peace, while the majority of Palestinians don't. According to the Israel Democracy Institute's Peace Index, nearly 70 per cent of Israelis are in favour of peace talks (though just 28.5 per cent believe dialogue will lead to a peace deal anytime soon). Meanwhile, the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey's latest figures show 55 per cent of Palestinians are against continued negotiations. Sixty-two per cent would reject a framework agreement that recognizes Israel as a Jewish state.

Peace can only be achieved when both sides truly want it. That is simply not the case. Not yet, anyway. ■ — YONI

OPINION

Why we must fight BDS on campus

Marc Newburgh and Raphael Szajnfarber

In recent days, student unions at McMaster and Ryerson universities have been targeted by activists pushing resolutions to endorse boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel alone. With support from Hillel and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), Jewish students and their allies have been vigorously working to expose these odious proposals for what they are: a modern-day blacklist and blatant discrimination on the basis of national origin. In so doing, we have learned first hand that BDS on campus has virtually nothing to do with Israel, and everything to do with the well-being of Jews and Zionists on campus.

To be clear, Canadian universities are actually strengthening their partnerships with Israeli universities. Last summer, during a trip to Israel by Canadian university presidents, co-hosted by CIJA and the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) signed an accord with Israel's association of university heads. As a result, every publicly funded Canadian university is now in a formal partnership with Israeli universities, and the AUCC has committed to expanding joint research projects, study opportunities, and faculty exchanges. This is not just an open refutation of BDS. It's a tangible building up of all that BDS activists, in their wildest fantasies, hope to destroy.

Indeed, research shows that not one university administration in Canada or the United States has supported BDS. In contrast, some have openly spoken against symbolic BDS resolutions passed by student governments.

In the case of the University of Windsor Students Association's recent referendum on BDS, the university president issued a strong response, declaring that "the University of Windsor has not endorsed the BDS movement" and that "the university will not allow the results of any referendum to compromise our values and our commitment to all who come here to study." The school's president subsequently launched an investigation of the referendum, citing allegations of misconduct throughout the referendum process. In his initial conclusion, the president ruled that the referendum "failed to adhere to the bylaws, processes and constitution of the UWSA" – a validation of the concerns of Jewish students and a significant blow to the credibility of BDS on campus.

For our students on the "front lines" of these symbolic battles in Hamilton and Toronto, calls for BDS are having no effect on trade or partnerships with Israel, but they have unavoidable effects on the place of Jewish students on campus.

The slanderous and detestable rhetoric that invariably accompanies BDS campaigns aims to cast Israel in a perpetual state of controversy. Associating with the State of Israel as the democratic homeland of the Jewish People is a core aspect of Jewish identity, secular and religious alike. Simply put, Jewish students cannot help but feel uncomfortable, alienated and – at times – intimidated by those who call for the Jewish state to be singled out for boycott.

At this point, we have strong reason to believe that mainstream students have entirely tuned out BDS, as evidenced by the fact the recent resolution at McMaster passed without quorum (and, therefore, enjoys no democratic legitimacy). In the case of Windsor, less than six per cent of students voted to support BDS.

But if BDS is eventually successful in creating a set of liabilities around those who support Israel's existence (distinct from particular Israeli policies), then it will pose an unacceptable restriction on the right of Jewish students to be openly, expressively Jewish. This is what we fight when we fight BDS. This is why we must ensure that what is currently a marginal phenomenon becomes a reviled one, denounced by mainstream students and campus leaders.

Hillel exists to provide every Jewish student with a comfortable Jewish gathering place on campus. As an extension of this, we have the responsibility to help keep collective student space – union meetings, public quads, and academic associations – free from discrimination and toxic rhetoric. Just as previous generations fought to end the social alienation of Jews, we must work to expose BDS as a form of prejudice and ensure that the broader student body rejects it accordingly. ■

The journey to a new CJN

An audacious plan to reshape and rethink what this newspaper means to Canadian Jewry

YONI GOLDSTEIN
ygoldstein@thecjn.ca

Almost exactly one year ago, the staff of The Canadian Jewish News was informed the paper would be closing shop, and in the days that followed, the news filtered out to the Jewish community. This week, The CJN is debuting a brand new design and embarking on an audacious plan to reshape and rethink what this newspaper means to Canadian Jewry.

How did that happen?

Clearly, you, our readers, were unsatisfied with the product we were producing – frankly, you felt The CJN wasn't delivering the goods. So you started to tune us out. And yet, when it was announced the paper would be folding, your reaction was immediate: Save The CJN!

Your support came through loud and clear. The CJN's board of directors, led by Elizabeth Wolfe, worked behind the scenes with Canadian media veteran Robert Attala to establish a business model that would rescue the newspaper, while grassroots organizers extended the conversation online. Within days, the #SaveTheCJN campaign gathered 3,000 signatures and 45,000 page views. After a few weeks, hope was already emerging The CJN might be preserved. It took a few more months to get things fully back on track, but here we are.

This week we debut a new look and new features, while many of your old favourites remain.

But enough about the past, let's talk about the here and now. What you are holding in your hands is in many ways a brand new publication. The paper stock is brighter; the images are bigger and bolder; the lines are clean and modern; and the logo directly acknowledges the colloquial name by which this newspaper is almost always referred to: The CJN.

But this redesign is about more than looks. This week, we debut a number of new features, including our history page, called "Back Story," and "Rabbi2Rabbi," which presents conversations between two rabbis on a wide range of topics.

You will also find a bevy of new writers that reflect the myriad of opinions in the Jewish community. We have added more than 15 new regular columnists who will debut over the next month, and many more talented essayists and thinkers will contribute periodically.

At the same time, many of your old favourites remain, including a host of columnists you've come to expect in The CJN. And there's one more important thing we haven't changed: The font and size of the text (if you want to get specific, it's called "Utopia 9.5").

In other words, the new CJN emphasizes modernity on the one hand and tradition on the other.

It's a delicate balancing act, but that's what Judaism is really about, isn't it?

When we set about how to reinvigorate the CJN in January, we had two initial goals. The first was to re-structure this paper as a newsmagazine – meaning, a hybrid publication that provides you with the news you need to know and also analyzes what that news means. The CJN remains committed to reporting on the Jewish community in the comprehensive manner, but in the future, we will be equally devoted to commentary, analysis and opinions.

It is our belief that a thinking community is a healthy community, and a community that challenges itself can only gain from the experience. You may not always agree with what our columnists or religious experts have to say, but our hope is you'll learn something new in every issue of The CJN.

Our second goal was to talk about issues of concern in the Jewish community that for too long have been swept under the rug – issues such as poverty, addiction, abuse and women's rights. In the weeks leading up to the launch of the new CJN, we have already started down this path, and we intend to continue.

We strongly believe it is our duty to ask the tough questions, even if they are sometimes hard to hear. And when we do so, it is our intention to also provide solutions – anyone can be a critic, but if there is no follow-up, ultimately there's not much point.

But we don't want you think it's all going to be gloom and doom. The Jewish community of Canada is strong and vibrant. There is an abundance of uplifting stories to tell, and we will do just that. We want to celebrate Canadian Jewry.

I'd like to conclude by thanking the staff of The CJN, the board of directors and the many community leaders and philanthropists who have helped us arrive at this point. I appreciate your tireless efforts over the last year to revive and refresh The Canadian Jewish News.

We are tremendously excited about the future of The CJN, and hope you are, too. We invite you to engage and communicate with us – and to keep challenging us to improve. And if you like what you see, we hope you'll consider supporting us by subscribing and spreading the word that The CJN is back, and better than ever. ■

So the world remained standing

Avrum Rosensweig

I have been honoured over the years to work with people who are willing to take on enormous responsibility to help others.

I believe it is these individuals who ensure the balance of our existence is tilted toward goodness. These people mirror today what Moses was trying to accomplish 3,000 years ago in his quest to "Let my people go." As commanded, this servant of God defended the beaten and heroically led the masses to the road out of Egypt – a place rife with the brutality of injustice.

The starkness of Moses' task and the clarity of his goals show how crucial it is for those who are good to stand up to dark forces and out-fight them, so that the world remains standing.

I see this same starkness today, in 2014, when I read about the history of Canada and some of the blights on our character and our past. Recently, dozens of native Canadians spoke to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission about how they were scooped out of their parents' hands as youngsters and sent off to "white homes," where they were adopted.

Coleen Rajotte was taken by children's services from her Cree community in Saskatchewan when she was three months old, and raised by a Manitoba family. She said that through this process, she lost her culture, her language and the love and familiarity of her real family.

(Some 20,000 native children were taken from their homes and placed with non-native families within a 20-year period, a course often considered to be an extension of the residential school system and a bid to "take the Indian out of the child.")

Yet, while this ugliness was happening, some very good people decided to take the reins of humanity and play whatever role they could years later in returning these grown children to safe earth, where they could mend, where they could repair their bodies and spirits. These are often quiet, low-key types, some of whom we will never know, some of whom are no longer with us, but all of whom made a decision early on to take on some of the pain of our aboriginal brothers and sisters, and walk with them toward the light of their personal and collective exodus. They must be remembered, honoured and celebrated by us.

I believe I have been in the presence of righteousness, because when I was with such people, I could exhale, knowing evil is not left uncapped, knowing the door to freedom, fairness and justice has been left ajar, ever so slightly.

I felt such a vitality when, along with two Holocaust survivors, Gerda Freiberg and Nate Leipciger, I visited the Pusuma family, a Jewish-Roma family given refuge by a church against a deportation notice. I wondered how it was the survivors were able to expose themselves to the plight of the Pusumas, knowing what they know about the Holocaust and its indignities. How could they ingest such injustice again? (Would we blame survivors for staying away from such places? Not for a moment. After all, they deserve the rest.)

Yet Gerda and Nate went, representing other survivors and those who perished, and all of us, the Jewish People. Their pain returned, yet they wanted to know about the beatings the Pusumas received from neo-Nazis in Budapest only a few years ago.

The wounded shared with the wounded, and in this way, they created healing and sought goodness.

It is said we were all at Mount Sinai. While there, we had a chance to meet the Israelites who had been enslaved. It was nasty. It was clear they had been affected and infected by the viciousness of their taskmasters.

But then we were also privy to the holiness of leadership, of those who led them across the sea, to that small hill, and helped them rediscover their holiness and self-respect. We knew while we stood there that it was those people who kept the world standing, and we remembered that Godliness and goodness will prevail when most people decide to oppose indifference, and instead grab onto the four-corners of compassion and action.

Chag Samayach. Happy Pesach. ■

Two-state solution: nightmare or reality?

Bernie Farber

I have a recurring nightmare, but first let me tell you the seeds that I believe originally spawned it.

It was June 1967, the Six Day War had just erupted. I was 15 years old, standing beside my father at Congregation Beth Shalom in Ottawa. It was the largest synagogue in the city, and it seemed that all of Ottawa's 5,000 Jews had crowded, shoulder to shoulder, into the sanctuary to hear Israel's ambassador to Canada, Gershon Avner.

Tall and elegant, Avner spoke with the grace of an academic. That night, his message was clear. Israel, he told us, was in a fight for its very existence. If it were to lose this war, the Jewish People's hopes and dreams for a Jewish homeland would be over. It was a night I will never forget. It was the first time I ever remember seeing my father, a Holocaust survivor, cry.

Israel was victorious in a war that lasted only six days, but would result in decades of consequences.

Israel tripled its size, acquiring the Sinai from Egypt as well as the West Bank and Gaza from Jordan and the Golan Heights from Syria. Eventually, following another almost catastrophic confrontation with Egypt in 1973, Israel – thanks to the courage of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, who made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to seek reconciliation – traded land for peace. And though it is a cold peace, it has held to this day.

Syria remains intransigent, while Jordan simply walked away from any further responsibility for the West Bank. And that has left Israel and world Jewry in a continuing conundrum.

Since 1967, Israel has had to struggle with the injustice of being an occupier. Indeed, many of us who grew up with Israel in the postwar period always believed that a just solution would be found. Once the dust settled, surely we would find a way to regain the high road and get out of the business of occupation.

This proved to be much more difficult than ever believed. Days turned to weeks, weeks and months to years. Occupation became more entrenched. Jewish settlements began springing up, which solidified Israel's grasp on the occupied territories. The dream of a peaceful, two-state solution began to grow ever dimmer.

The Oslo accords brought some glimmers of hope, but that, too, seemed to be more a hope than a reality and proved in the end to be, as my father would have said, a bubbe mayse (a fairy tale).

We came close on few more occasions. Even a very generous offer of Gaza and 97 per cent of the West Bank by then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak was turned down by a myopic Yasser Arafat. Sadly, this led to a second intifadah and mistrust on both sides.

Clearly, in order for Israel to survive as a nation that values justice and equality, a solution that gives a measure of fairness to both sides must be found. It's here that my nightmare begins: what if a solution is never found?

For Israel to continue to rule over four million people is untenable. Israel's own census experts, demographer Sergio Della Pergola of Hebrew University and Arnon Soffer, a geographer at the University of Haifa, have warned, "Without a partition deal, Jews will eventually become a minority, because of higher Arab population growth."

Recently, even Israel's finance minister, Yair Lapid lamented, "Every moment we don't separate from the Palestinians is a clear threat to the existence of Israel as a Jewish state."

And so the recurring nightmare: no final status deal is reached, and according to Israel's own census bureau, in about a generation, "the higher Arab and lower Jewish growth rates will converge." Sadly, therefore, the unthinkable becomes thinkable. As Israel's justice minister and chief peace negotiator, Tzipi Livni, as well as former prime ministers and even Shin Bet directors have warned, failure to reach a just two-state solution may mean Israel could become an apartheid state. There is only one answer, and again Soffer and Pergola state the obvious, noting that "if Israel gives up most of the West Bank, it can assure a Jewish majority at home for eternity, [but] keeping the West Bank means you must give up on a Jewish state."

We must be brave. It's time we all support Israel in taking the bold steps necessary to ensure its survival as a democratic, equality-loving Jewish state. It's time to end the nightmare. ■

OPINION

Evangelicals who distort history and religion

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Critics of the pro-Israel stance of millions of American mainstream evangelicals have said that they may love Jews, but they hate Judaism. Their love is manifest, above all, in their embrace of Zionism and their unequivocal commitment to the State of Israel. Their hatred, or at least animosity, is in their theology.

It's usually described as supersessionist or replacement theology. It teaches that the church has replaced Israel as God's chosen and that the new covenant with Jesus renders obsolete the old covenant with Abraham. Similarly Jewish law has been superseded by Christian love. Commandments such as, "Love your neighbour as yourself" can only be fulfilled in the religion of Christ.

In this scheme of things, the presence of Jews in the world adhering to their allegedly outdated faith delays Jesus' second coming. But unlike those Christians who in ages past sought to punish Jews by obliterating or humiliating them, today's mainstream evangelicals maintain that, when all Jews come together in the land of their ancestors, they'll see the light, embrace the faith in Jesus and thus make possible the fulfillment of the Christian promise of the Second Coming.

Many Jews choose to respond with enthusiasm to Christian Zionists, despite their theology, because they promote tourism to Israel and influence members of the U.S. Congress to support the Jewish state.

However, in recent years, some younger evangelicals seem to have distanced themselves from the uncritical view of the State of Israel by offering their own hostile versions of Jews and Judaism.

Influenced by liberation theology that takes the side of the underdog and denounces those in power, they want the Palestinian narrative to guide evangelical Christianity. They seek to affirm Christ at the Israeli security checkpoints that they accuse of epitomizing oppression.

Palestinians are viewed as victims while Zionists are regarded as villains. The evangelical revisionists say they love Jews but have extended their disdain of Judaism to include the State of Israel and, by inference, its Jewish citizens and supporters.

Much of this teaching is apparently being promoted by Bethlehem Bible College.

Last month, it sponsored another conference with the telling title, "Christ at the Checkpoint." Reports indicate that the 650 participants from 15 countries got minimal exposure to the Jewish narrative. They were told that Jesus wasn't a Jew, but was a Palestinian, and that the notion of a Jewish People is a late invention with no roots in the Land of Israel.

No wonder, therefore, that Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs issued a statement urging well-meaning Christians to stay away from "Christ at the Checkpoint" and described it as using religion "in order to mobilize political propaganda."

This skewed version of history isn't only in sharp contrast to the teachings of their parents and grandparents but also in opposition to a recent pronouncement by Pope Francis, who stated that "we hold the Jewish People in special regard because their covenant with God has never been revoked." That's one of the reasons why it has become easier for this Jew to talk to critical Catholics than to ostensibly friendly Protestants.

The stance of the latter is often highly selective. Not only does it tend to ignore the growing number of Christian Arabs in Israel who want to be part of the Jewish state, but these champions of the rights of the Palestinians seem to be ominously silent about persecution of Christians in Muslim countries.

Bernard Lewis, the doyen of Middle East scholars, distinguishes between being pro-Arab and anti-Jewish. Pro-Arabs champion the cause of Arabs under all circumstances, while anti-Jews do so only when Jews are on the other side. "Christ at the Checkpoint" seems to belong to the latter category. ■

Iran's charter of intolerance

Sheryl Saperia and Danny Eisen

Canadian stakeholders have approached Senator David Tkachuk, who championed the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA) for eight years before it became law in 2012, with a recommendation for a new bill. The proposed legislation would enhance Canada's existing sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran, specifically targeting the regime for its terror sponsorship and human rights violations. Current sanctions relate solely to Iran's illicit nuclear weapons program.

The proposal comes on the heels of fresh reports of Iranian contempt for human rights and international law. In March alone, Iran was caught smuggling missiles on a commercial ship, to terrorist organizations in the Middle East; a former Iranian intelligence officer admitted that Iran ordered the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, which killed 270 people; an Ahwazi Arab-Iranian poet and human rights activist living in the Netherlands was kidnapped, beaten and interrogated by Iranian agents; and a Canadian court found Iran liable for its support of terrorism in a historic ruling under the JVTA. Pursuant to court orders, seven-million dollars' worth of Iranian bank accounts and property situated in Canada will be turned over to victims of terrorist groups on Iran's payroll.

Since 1979, more than 100,000 Iranians have been executed, women are still stoned to death for adultery, and Amnesty International has crowned the Iranian regime "the last [state] executioner of children." Iran has the highest per capita rate of capital punishment in the world. Even Iranian nationals living abroad have been unable to escape. Iran's death squads have killed over 100 dissidents in various countries, including the United States and several European nations.

As torture statistics are harder to quantify, the precise number of individuals flogged, mutilated or raped under the direction of Iranian authorities is difficult to ascertain. But the pervasive use of these punishments on the multitudes passing through Iran's criminal justice system is well documented.

All of this should make Canadians wonder: what are the Iranian regime's intentions with regard to the new charter, and what does it mean for Canadian policies on Iran?

Iranian President Hassan Rouhani was a close aide of Ayatollah Khomeini and is a current devotee of Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei, with impeccable regime credentials. As president, he now oversees his country's assistance to Bashar Assad in slaughtering the Syrian people and the training provided by Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) to civilian militias that work in concert with the Venezuelan government in the violent repression of the Venezuelan populace.

Given Rouhani's résumé and the regime's record of violating the international human rights treaties to which it is a signatory, it seems that the "Charter of Citizens' Rights" is more a "charter of values" – designed to ensconce the Khomeinist values of intolerance rather than recognize the inherent rights of all citizens regardless of religion, creed, gender or ethnicity. As noted by Nazila Ghanea, who teaches international law at the University of Oxford, the Charter's reliance on Iran's existing legal frameworks brings with it "explicit discriminatory exclusions" that will legally formalize Iranian abuses in practice and in principle.

The legislative proposal to Senator Tkachuk is thus both timely and necessary. For, despite its malevolence, the Iranian regime craves legitimacy as a regional leader and world power, and bristles at international censure even while defying it. Nuclear sanctions have brought Iran to the negotiating table, and past international campaigns have successfully saved imprisoned Iranians from death. This bill will provide an additional lifeline to Iranians whose fates and futures are being papered over by Rouhani's charter of intolerance, and a new opportunity for Canadians to mitigate some of the cruelties of the Iranian regime. This bill is best passed sooner rather than later. ■

Goldkind in race for mayor of Toronto

Ari Goldkind says the only way to solve Toronto's transportation problems is by addressing the need for more tax revenue.

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Ari Goldkind doesn't seem to mind being called one of the "fringe" candidates for mayor of Toronto. As far as he's concerned, that's a temporary situation that will change as soon as he sits down for "an adult conversation" with the people of Toronto about the solutions he's offering to the problems facing the city.

None of the other candidates will offer much more than shopworn slogans when pressed on the vital issues touching the city. That is, when they're not avoiding the tough questions altogether. He, on the other hand, makes it clear he won't avoid the dreaded term that some politicians – he points his finger directly at current mayor Rob Ford – have made into "a four-letter word," taxes.

There's no way to sugar-coat it, he suggests. The City of Toronto faces transportation problems and a crumbling infrastructure, and these can only be addressed by more tax revenue.

Goldkind believes the people of Toronto would be ready to part with more of their cash to address these concerns. Wouldn't you, he argued, if all it meant was the value of two or three tanks of gasoline a year – $150-$200 based on property taxes for a house valued around $600,000-$700,000. The money that would be raised would go to two funds, one for transit, the other for infrastructure.

And the city would get a subway relief line and light rail lines to speed the transportation of commuters.

Goldkind would also implement a toll on drivers using the Gardiner Expressway and the Don Valley Parkway. Three-quarters of the people using those highways don't live in Toronto and don't support the roads' maintenance through their taxes. Furthermore, imposing tolls would cut congestion and make the daily commute for most users much shorter, he said.

Goldkind, 40, launched his bid for mayor a couple of weeks ago. Unlike the five main contenders – Ford, John Tory, Olivia Chow, Karen Stintz and David Soknacki – he has no prior political experience.

But he does have the gift of the gab. He's confident that if elected, he can persuade Queen's Park and Ottawa to return to Toronto some of the taxes the city contributes to the other levels of government.

He's critical of the way his opponents articulated their positions at the recent debates: "These are people who can't string a sentence together without a script," he said. "My whole life is unscripted."

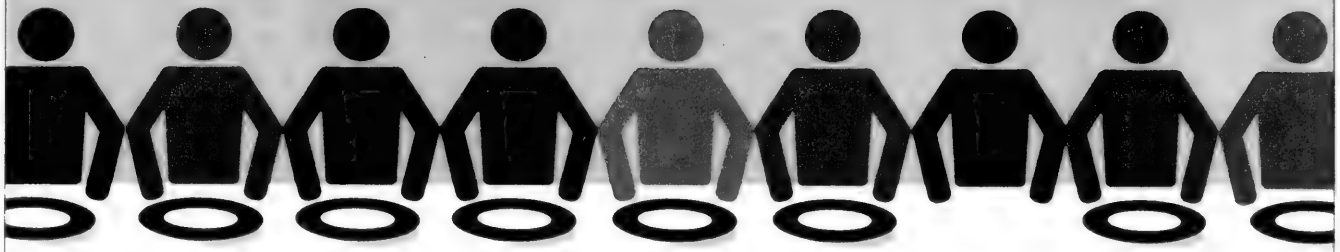
UJA's GLOBAL SEDER TO FIGHT HUNGER

United Jewish Appeal



Can you imagine
a Jewish holiday without food?

Probably not. But that's the reality facing thousands of Jews living in Toronto, Israel, Cuba and the Former Soviet Union who can't afford the basic staples for Passover.

But it doesn't have to be this way.

Please give to United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's Global Seder to Fight Hunger, to help Jews in need celebrate Passover in dignity.

Lung transplant survivor becomes an advocate for organ donation

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dov Altman always tells audiences at his speaking engagements that Israel is a miracle, but since his double lung transplant last September he's been adding that he, too, is a miracle. Then he raises the subject of organ donation.

"The fact that I'm standing here speaking is a miracle," Altman, executive vice-president and CEO of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, said at a speech he gave at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation recently.

Altman, now 54, was diagnosed with a lung disease called pulmonary fibrosis in 2007. However, he was symptom-free for the next few years, because the disease lay dormant. "I had imagined it was a chronic disease, and I would live to a ripe, old age and not have to worry," he said.

Suddenly, in February 2013, Altman began to experience symptoms of the disease, which causes scarring in the lungs that prevents oxygen flow. "By the end of March, I was very limited in my breathing," he said. His health deteriorated so much over the next few months that he went from being healthy and robust to using a walker.

The only treatment option for pulmonary fibrosis is a transplant, so in May, Altman entered the assessment program at the Lung Transplant Clinic at Toronto General Hospital. "They want you in the best shape possible to make sure nothing else can go wrong in the process," he said.

Altman was put on the waiting list for a transplant in August, and he began a regime of physiotherapy three times a week, consultations with a dietitian, and interviews with a psychologist and and a social worker. "They prepare you both physically and mentally for the procedure and the wait," he said.

Altman added that the wait is a double-edged sword, because "you need a transplant, but you have to wait for somebody to die. At the same time, you're getting weaker. They tell you that the average wait is seven months, but one woman I met waited two years."

At this writing, 1,534 people in Ontario were waiting for organ transplants. In 2012, 161 Canadians died while they were waiting, 97 of them in Ontario, according to the Canadian Institute for Health Information.

Dov Altman

While he was waiting, Altman turned to his rabbi, Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation, for advice. Rabbi Saltzman told him, "You're not waiting for someone to die. They're going to die anyway. You're waiting for someone to make the courageous decision to become an organ donor."

To Altman's surprise, just five weeks after he was put on the waiting list, in September, he got "the call."

He and his wife, Elana, were at the monthly information session Toronto General holds for people who need transplants. The first speaker was the transplant co-ordinator, who stressed how important it was to pick up the call when it comes. If you don't take the call within the hour, the co-ordinator moves on to someone else.

Altman got several cellphone calls from his dentist's office while he was at the meeting, which he ignored. Then he received another call, from an unidentified caller, which he took.

"Sure enough it was TGH saying, 'We have a match,'" he said.

"I was lucky, and it's because I'm tall. The criteria for a match are blood type and size. I have a common blood type and a large chest cavity," said Altman, who's six foot four. "Any size lung would fit into me."

Before the surgery could begin, though, Altman, his wife, his sister and other family members waited at the hospital for another four hours while the surgeon determined if the lungs were healthy enough to use. They were, and Altman went into surgery for 11 hours.

He was told he would be in an induced coma for a day or two, but he woke up three hours after surgery with a tube in his throat. "It was amazing. When they took the tube out, I was breathing with my own lungs, with no assistance." He began physiotherapy almost immediately after surgery. Soon, he was up walking the hospital corridors, and he went home after 2-1/2 weeks.

The biggest adjustment, Altman said, was getting used to taking the drugs that prevent his body from rejecting the lungs.

"I take 40 to 50 pills a day – anti-rejection drugs and drugs to counter the anti-rejection drugs," he said. "The biggest risk for not surviving is not taking the rejection drugs," he added, explaining that sometimes people who have had transplants may feel so good that they stop taking their drugs.

The drugs, however, lower Altman's resistance to infection. For three months after surgery, he didn't go to a play, restaurant or anywhere he might pick up an infection.

A fundraiser for Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, Altman is now back on the public-speaking circuit and he's back to walking at his regular quick pace. But every day he tests his lung capacity – "if it's down, I call and go in" to the transplant clinic – and he takes his temperature daily, because fever can lead to rejection.

Altman says the support he got from his his family, including his wife, his two children, Neil, 22, and Jillian, 18, as well as his extended family and friends was the greatest gift of all. His neighbours in the Cedarvale area of Toronto took to bringing meals to his wife.

Only 24 per cent of Ontarians and 15 per cent of Torontonians are registered to be organ and tissue donors, according to the Trillium Gift of Life Network (TGL), provincial agency that plans, promotes, co-ordinates and supports organ and tissue donation and transplantation across Ontario. With such low rates, Altman said "his life, whether professional or private, is about telling people the importance of becoming an organ donor."

His campaign is on Facebook, and he has a page connected to the TGL's website, at https://beadonor.ca/dov-altman, where people can register to become donors. His goal was to get 150 registrations, and at this writing, he had 125. He noted that it's important to register rather than just sign the back of your driver's licence, in case you don't have your driver's licence with you in a medical emergency. "You can save up to eight lives," he said.

Music

Itzhak Perlman plays Toronto:
A gifted violinist stuns the heart, stirs the soul

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Emotions inevitably soar whenever Itzhak Perlman plays his violin. He is a uniquely gifted musician whose tender-hearted nature, uncanny understanding of most composers' intentions for their work and sheer, dynamic, physical skill always combine to create a memorable auditory-sensual-musical experience.

His ability to stun the heart and stir the soul with the sounds he evokes from his instrument may be unparalleled among violinists in our generation.

When those sounds are the liturgical, folkloric, Yiddish melodies and tunes of the Ashkenazi Jewish world; when Perlman shares the stage with the renowned Yitzchak Meir Helfgott, chief cantor of Park East Synagogue in New York and the cantor's piano accompanist Cantor Daniel Gildart; when Perlman and Helfgott are joined by the Klezmer Conservatory Band and the 17-piece Eternal Echoes Chamber Orchestra conducted by Russell Ger; and when the repertoire of selections is arranged by the scholar composer Hankus Netsky, the result is an emotional feast.

Indeed, such was the musical-emotional banquet last week at Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto. The two virtuosos, in a sense, reprised their performance of a year ago at the same venue. The musical offerings were not the same as last time, but the dreamy, sentimental evocations and electric charges of spirit and enthusiasm were.

From the very first instant Perlman "scootered" onto the stage, he held the audience rapt with his personality and the music that flowed from his violin. His solo virtuosity, his duets with Helfgott, his accompaniment of other performers and his playful banter with Netsky and the audience were the solid, colourful twine that held the concert together.

Audience treated to variety of 14 offerings

The large, appreciative audience was treated to a variety of some 14 offerings that included lively, high-spirited klezmer dance tunes, soulful Yiddish melodies and soaring cantorial piyutim (prayers). The adroit, smooth relationship between Perlman and Helfgott was never more poignantly demonstrated than during their performance of the two Yiddish songs A Dudele and A Yiddishe Mameh.

A Dudele, the theologically definitive monologue by the storied chassid, Levi Yitzhak of Berditchev, and A Yiddishe Mameh, the tearful reminiscence by an adult child, embodied the musical and emotional essence of the evening. In each song, Perlman and Helfgott achieved a combined musical splendour that built upon the characteristically minor key, lachrymose centre of Yiddish melodies, but rose far above to an impassioned affirmation of collective belonging and comfort.

The encore selection – Shlomo Carlebach's rendition of the Passover Haggadah song Adir Hu – was a rousing, foot-stomping, sing-along delivery performed by the entire ensemble.

Itzhak Periman

As they left the auditorium, many audience members could be heard humming bits and pieces of the songs the masters had performed for them.

The concert, entitled Eternal Echoes: Songs and Dances for the Soul, was in support of Chai Lifeline Canada. It was the seventh annual Sing for the Children event on behalf of the organization, whose services are dedicated to helping families cope with the emotional, financial and other distresses that arise when a child is struck with serious illness.

Yummy Schacter, who along with his wife Shoshana, founded the annual Sing for the Children program seven years ago, described the Perlman-Helfgott concert as "very moving and uplifting. We achieved our double purpose of providing an evening of incredible entertainment as well as highlighting the important work of the organization. Every year, the event continues to grow and raises more awareness for Chai Lifeline."

Craig Fried, director of development of Chai Lifeline Canada told The CJN the organization's donors are its "heroes" since it is they who "afford us the opportunity to provide the critical support that our children and families need in their most vulnerable time." Fried praised the organization's supporters for "helping establish an organization that provides care with compassion and a high degree of support to achieve the best outcomes." As an example, he noted that the organization recently received a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation for its after-school therapy program called Shining Stars, for children with physical disabilities or those who suffer from cancer. Two donors have since come forward to ensure the program's long-term stability.

The organization used the occasion to honour Dena and Daniel Gryfe and Bracha Silver for the respective and impressive examples of philanthropy and strength of character.

All of organization's programs are free of charge to children and their families. For more information, call 647-430-5933 or visit www.ChaiLifelineCanada.org. ■

Zippan family planning 19th seder

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In a tradition they are proud of, all four generations of the Zippan family will be gathering from across North America for its 19th family seder on Erev Pesach, April 14.

"Invitations go out to more than 40 families, comprising over 100 people. Attendance is usually 50 to 70 people. This year's seder has 63 confirmed guests," said family member Jonathan Gladstone.

Zelig Tsipaniuk (Zane Zippan) and Chifra Klara had seven children, all born in or near Brosilow, in what's now Ukraine, between 1894 and 1915. One of their children, Baruch, died in 1917 of a fever, while fighting in the Russian Revolution. The other six Tsipaniuk children survived to immigrate to Canada with their parents in 1926 and ultimately simplified the spelling of their name – some used Zippan, but others chose to use Zippin. Those who came to Canada were Chaya Sura (married Abe Cutler), Ben Zippan (married Sarah Goldman), Tybel (Tilly) Zippan (married Max Gladstone).

Sam Zippin (married Fay Noble), Tsipura (Sylvia) Zippan (married Joe Cohen) and Jack Zippan (married Rose Klein).

They were among the early members of Toronto's Kiever Congregation, where many of the family are still members today. All six children, and later their spouses, children and grandchildren, remained close over the years. The Zippan children have all passed away, but left their children with a sense of the importance of family. The last of the six, Yankel, or Jack, the youngest, died a few years ago. His widow, Rose, died just recently.

"We have photos and stories from family seders going back to the 1940s. There's one photo in which my father, Norman Gladstone, is about 13 years old, which means it was during World War Two," Jonathan said.

Miriam Freedman is a granddaughter of Zelig and Chifra, through her late mother, Sylvia. She's also one of the two main organizers, along with her cousin, Beverly Freedman, who is a great-granddaughter – her mother's parents were Chaya Sura and Abe. Beverly's mother, Betty, married Murray Freedman.

Jonathan Gladstone is a great-grandson. "My father Norman's parents were Tilly and Max," he explained. "The original children's generation is now all gone. But most of the grandchildren and great-grandchildren survive, and the first of the great-great-grandchildren (Beverly's granddaughter, Lea) is a toddler now, along with the youngest of the great-grandchildren. And there are more of those likely yet to come!" Jonathan said.

"My mother, Sylvia Cohen, was the one that kept the family together. She held the seders every year and the entire family came. As she got older, she wasn't well and we broke up into groups," Miriam Freedman said.

"In 1995, my cousin, Ruchel Gladstone, whose mother was a sister of my mother, decided that nobody was happy with this arrangement as we all loved being together. From then on, we started having the seder at my aunt's apartment party room."

Making sure everyone knows about the seder takes careful organization.

"Jonathan sends out a notice to everyone months before – a save-the-date – and then he sends out an email as to when and where," Miriam said. "Beverly and I go down the list and decide what everybody should make. Jonathan designs the most beautiful place cards with some kind of symbol for Pesach on it. Cousins come in from California, Florida and Montreal – nobody wants to miss out."

They will miss having Rose Zippan at the seder this year, Miriam said.

"My aunt, Rose Zippan, was the only living original member at the seder. We would do a little tribute to her and tell her how happy we were that she was here with us. She recently passed away at the age of 99. I remember with fondness at seders past every generation, young and old, came over to talk to Auntie Rose.

"My son-in-law, Jeffrey Hoffman, now runs the seder. We have a portable microphone that gets passed around, everybody reads from the Haggadah while 'together aloud' the children recite the four questions and we all sing songs."

Arranging food for so many people is also a challenge, but, in addition to deciding what people should bring, the cousins have developed a system for ensuring that there is enough food and some traditional dishes are served.

"My daughter Karen, cousin Beverley and I make 20 pounds of gefilte fish for the seder, using a recipe that dates back to when my mother still held her seders. Everybody has a comment to make about our gefilte fish, such as, 'it's better than last year,' and most all the comments are favourable," Miriam said laughing.

Miriam and Beverly document exactly what they serve at the seder, and afterward, they go through the list and make notes, such as "fantastic," or "let's not make this next year," "too much food," or "not enough."

"When we go through the menu the next year, we have everything written down with comments. It's a lot of shlepping, but well worth the effort.

"My mother taught my brother and I that family is the most important thing. Seeing everybody come to the seder hugging, kissing and so happy to see each other – it's very special.

"That's what my mother taught us, and we're passing it on," Miriam said with a tear in her eye. ■

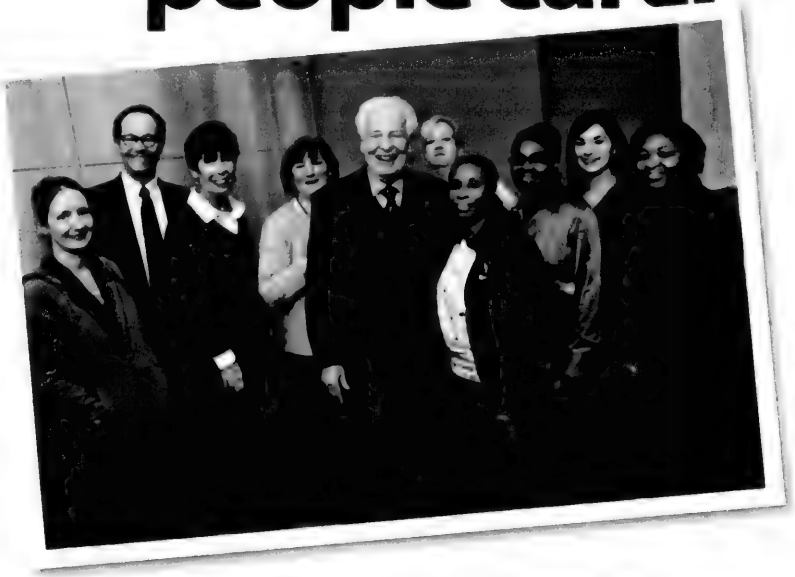
This is what happens when people care.



Joey Tanenbaum surrounded by the members of General Internal Medicine nursing team at Toronto General Hospital and UHN Physician Dr Michael Baker, Rose Family Chair in Medicine

It's a wonderful world when compassion and professionalism are rewarded with selfless generosity.

A special bond was formed when Joey Tanenbaum was admitted to Toronto General Hospital last December. A longtime supporter of UHN, he gained a new perspective on the excellent care he experienced and witnessed throughout the ward. Each patient, and every family member, was treated with compassion, dignity and respect by the nursing staff. It left more than an indelible impression.

Joey and Toby Tanenbaum have made a $2.2 million donation to support nurses in their professional development so they can increase their leadership skills, discover new ways to collaborate and foster innovation, to ensure every patient receives the highest quality patient and family-centred care.

Today, thanks to the extraordinary generosity of Joey and Toby Tanenbaum, nurses at Toronto General Hospital know what compassion, generosity and professionalism looks like when it comes full circle.

Israeli columnist rejects 'two-state solution'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

For a typical Canadian observer of the Middle East, Caroline Glick's viewpoint and solutions seems to come out of left field. Or in her case, right field.

A widely read columnist for the Jerusalem Post, Glick says we ought to abandon the "two-state solution." Ignore doom-and-gloom prognostications that Israel will be swamped by a demographic surge of Palestinians. It's not happening, she said. Israelis are having more babies than the Palestinians.

Stop being so defensive about asserting Jewish rights. It's our land and always has been. By agreeing to hand over some of it to the Palestinians as part of a failed peace process, Israelis have in effect endorsed the Palestinian narrative that they are at fault for the conflict, she argues.

The solution, said Glick, in an address last week at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, is to do what Israel did in Jerusalem and the Golan – apply Israeli law to Judea and Samaria, a.k.a., the West Bank.

Caroline Glick

"This land is ours by history, by international legal rights, and it's ours by justice, and we have to assert those rights," she said.

Glick is author of The Israeli Solution: A One-State Plan for Peace in the Middle East. Her position stands in sharp contrast to the one adopted by successive Israeli governments, but she believes Israel's international standing was stronger, not weaker, when it stood up to international pressure.

Israel thought that by yielding its rights and turning over territory, it would foster international goodwill and enhance its diplomatic cachet. Instead, the opposite has occurred.

If Israel wants international respect, it has to assert its rights, she said. If Israel wants to tell advocates of boycotts, divestments and sanctions where to stick their positions, it has to be assertive.

"You can't do it if all you say is we want defensible borders" and if you agree that the other side, which "exists only to destroy you," has rights.

Speaking at an event organized by the Toronto Zionist Council, Glick suggested that her audience imagine what would happen if Israel does hand over Judea and Samaria to the Palestinian leadership. Even if you consider Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas a moderate – a suggestion she questioned – he'll bring in terrorists from UN refugee camps. In an open Jerusalem, they'll be able to walk into the Old City through the Damascus Gate, exit through the Jaffa Gate and walk right into the new city.

"They have been marinating in genocidal Jew hatred for 66 years. What are the chances they want peace? Zero," she asserted.

Glick, who was embedded in a U.S. army unit during the 2003 Iraq war, said the United States really doesn't understand the region.

"You can't get it because your guiding policies are all wrong," she said.

Glick noted that contrary to accepted wisdom, the Palestinian public's perception of Israel is not all bad. A survey recently revealed that two-thirds to three-quarters say the democracy they most admire is Israel's.

Another poll revealed that while 46 per cent of Israelis opposed a unilateral withdrawal from Judea and Samaria, 59 per cent of Palestinians oppose it.

"These numbers are extraordinary. What they tell us, if we know how to empower Palestinians to lead the good life, they will do so," she said.

Another survey showed that while 30 per cent of Palestinians preferred to live under Palestinian sovereignty, 35 per cent preferred Israeli sovereignty.

And in Israel itself, Palestinian Christians are abandoning the pan-Arab ideology. "They no longer want to identify as Arabs, but as Christians," she said.

They look next door and see what is happening to Christians throughout the Middle East. Arab families are enrolling their children in Hebrew-language schools and Israel has seen a 300 per cent increase in the number of Arab Christians volunteering for military service.

"This is an earthquake," she said, adding there are now unique opportunities to change the status quo. ■

COMMENT

Remembering Kev

CARA EDELL
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

As a journalist, I report on the good, the bad, the happy and the sad. While I was trained to be emotionally removed from the subject matter I cover, it is sometimes not that simple. When a story or person is so touching and inspirational, I cannot help but feel. It may not be the most objective response, but I am human, after all.

Today I received shocking and very unfortunate news from a young woman I interviewed a month ago. Her name is Nadine Block, and she informed me that her father, Kevin, passed away from the cancer that plagued him.

For those who did not read my article on "Keeping Kev" – the social media campaign that Nadine and her brother Jamie created to save their father's life – I will provide a brief summary.

In June 2013, Kevin Block, 56, was diagnosed with Stage 4 non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. He endured countless attempts at various chemotherapies without success. Kevin's illness left him unable to work, and as a result he lost his business.

At the end of January 2014, Nadine, 23, and Jamie, 17, received the devastating news that there was no cure for their father in Canada. They immediately began "Keeping Kev" to fight for his life.

Their campaign's mission was to raise the required funds for Kevin to be able to participate in a clinical drug trial only available in the United States. It was his only hope for survival.

When I spoke to Nadine for my story, I asked her what message she wanted to spread to other young people through her campaign.

She said: "First, appreciate every day that you have with your family because you never know when that can be taken away from you. Second, never underestimate what you are capable of doing. Almost one month ago, I would never have imagined that my friends, family and I would have created such a success in such a short period of time. Being proactive and positive goes a long way. Third, don't sweat the small stuff. Life is too precious."

Her words could not be more powerful. We are all guilty of taking our blessings for granted. We are all guilty of being lazy or not stepping up to the plate.

When Nadine emailed me this morning about Kevin's passing, she thanked me for my "hard work and dedication" in publicizing her family's situation. It means a lot to me as a writer to know that people appreciate my efforts, but I didn't become a journalist to receive praise.

My mission in my career is to help others through my words. I strive to bring attention to worthy causes. I try to make an impact so that something positive can come from the negative in our world.

The story of Kevin Block is one I will never forget. I did not have the pleasure of meeting this man in person, but he and his family have tugged at my heartstrings.

If you take anything from this article, take this: life is unpredictable, so make the most of what you have. And above all, love. ■

Mother celebrates her son's triumphs

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Nothing in life can prepare new parents for the experience they are about to have. But for Andrew Trossman and Marcy White, the birth of Jacob, their first child, was like riding a roller-coaster that never stopped.

In May 2002, Jacob was born with paralyzed vocal cords; severe stridor, a high-pitched, wheezing sound caused by disrupted airflow in the throat or larynx; and an inability to swallow without aspirating. He spent the first three months of his life in Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

It took a further seven months to get a diagnosis.

Jacob has a rare disorder called Pelizaeus-Merzbacher disease (PMD), which affects approximately one in 100,000 live births worldwide and is not limited to any particular demographic population. It is a progressive, degenerative central nervous system disorder in which co-ordination, motor abilities and intellectual function deteriorate.

PMD is categorized as a myelin disorder, in the same family as multiple sclerosis and is inherited as an X-linked recessive trait. The affected individuals are male, but the mothers are the carriers.

Jacob Trossman is seen with the book The Boy Who Can, and his mother, Marcy White, who wrote the book about him.

Marcy White, Jacob's mother, recently launched her first book, The Boy Who Can: The Jacob Trossman Story.

The medical professionals were not optimistic that Jacob would have the ability to learn or to understand what was going on around him. Part survival manual, part parent-child love story, The Boy Who Can is a chronicle of a mother's refusal to accept the limitations placed on her son. Each chapter of the book begins with a meaningful quote that summarizes its main theme.

"One hundred per cent of the proceeds of the book will fund Jacob's care. He has extensive medical needs, with 24-hour nursing care and special equipment, medicine and supplies. Not much is understood about PMD, with virtually no research in Canada. Jacob is not given the best outlook, but what both we and the doctors have seen is that Jacob can do – he is capable and he needs academic stimulation."

Goldkind slammed Ford for use of crack cocaine

Goldkind practices criminal law. He worked for a time in the corporate field, but found it too boring. The criminal bar, on the other hand, is where the action is. It's stimulating – just take a look at the potential clientele in any courthouse on a given Monday morning – and it affords him the opportunity to employ his gifts of persuasion.

He clearly knows how to deliver a zinger. He slammed Ford for his use of crack cocaine and for his simple message of keeping taxes in check; he said Chow is a money machine beholden to special interests; Stintz has flip-flopped on the Scarborough subway; and Tory won't provide details about what his plan was for transit.

"People know exactly what they're getting" with Tory, Stintz and Chow, "and all they're getting is either Ford light or Ford without the crack," he said.

But doesn't your lack of political experience harm your chances, he's asked.

"We have a bunch of career politicians running for mayor. How's that working out?" he replied. "It's time for fresh ideas, real solutions, having a grown-up conversation about the problems Toronto faces."

Items on Goldkind's agenda include:

- replacing the proposed Scarborough subway line with an light rail alternative;
- building "a full relief [subway] line all around the city and LRT lines elsewhere;
- stopping expansion of Billy Bishop airport;
- privatizing garbage collection in areas not already receiving that service, but only "if it saves the taxpayer money."

Goldkind said his focus "would be to convince the unions to be competitive. The old days are over. The public sector doesn't get to be paid wages higher than those in the private sector. Those days are unfortunately behind us."

Goldkind believes that as his message gets out, it will resonate with Toronto voters.

Goldkind prides himself in being self reliant. The child of divorced parents, he was raised from age 11 by his grandparents. One of his first jobs, at 11, was selling popcorn and Cracker Jack at Maple Leaf Gardens. For eight years he sold programs at SkyDome.

He put himself through university, first as an undergraduate at Queen's and then through law school at the University of Toronto.

"I've always been self-sufficient," he said. "I understand the need to invest in myself and take risks."

But being charitable is not something for which one should be defensive, he continued. He believes in taking care of people who are less fortunate than himself. "And that means supporting the city that can be so great for all."

"We have a responsibility to leave the city better than we found it." ■

iPod created just for Jacob to communicate

"White 'tells it as it is' [in her book]," said Dr. Tom Chau, senior scientist and vice-president of research at Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital. "She openly acknowledges her own brokenness, weaknesses, fears, dashed hopes and disappointments. These are counterbalanced by glimpses of possibility and celebration in precious moments."

Chau created a communication device, an iPod, just for Jacob, which has opened a whole world for the child. On the outside, it appears to be a regular iPod, but the inner workings are programmed with several main categories and sub-categories that Jacob can activate with just a slight movement of his head.

Jacob is now 11 years old. He is in a wheelchair and can't walk, but he can move his head a little with some purposeful movements. His vocal chords are paralyzed, and although he can neither swallow nor speak, he can make sounds.

"Breathing is a challenge, and making himself understood is frustrating," White said. "Parenting Jake is immensely hard, and watching other children thrive sometimes makes me want to run away and hide."

> If I had one wish for Jacob, it would be to talk. If he could talk, he could tell us what he really wants and what is going on in his mind.

But despite the hardships, and there are many, Jacob has managed to experience some very typical rites of passage.

Jacob is a Grade 5 student at Elkhorn Public School, where he has a helper and a nurse at his side. He loves to learn and his favourite subject is French.

He also attends Hebrew school at the Hebrew Academy of North York and has become a fixture at Yedidus, a program run at Bais Yaakov High School every Sunday morning by Jewish teenage girls.

"Some of the most phenomenal examples of compassion and love are showered on Jacob when these kids play with him, talk to him and spin him in circles to make him laugh," White said.

Jacob can communicate by opening his mouth for yes and making a sound for no. He loves to swim, ski and be around people.

"If I had one wish for Jacob, it would be to talk. If he could talk, he could tell us what he really wants and what is going on in his mind."

She knows their time together is limited. "His life span is short. There are numbers that are talked about, but I can't bring myself to say those numbers. His condition will worsen as he ages. We have already seen that start to happen," White said.

The Boy Who Can is available in soft cover and ebook. Visit: www.theboywhocan.com to purchase the book and www.curepmd.com to learn more about PMD. ■

Meir Medical Centre honours Justin Trudeau with award

PAUL LUNGEN
PLUNGEN@THECJN.CA

The Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Center gathered at a Toronto synagogue over the weekend to present awards of merit to a trio of recipients, but one of those receiving the award, the one everybody wanted to see, was conspicuous by his absence.

Instead, the 200 supporters who had gathered at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue were treated to a 5-1/2-minute video in which Liberal party leader Justin Trudeau – the missing award-winner – expressed his regret for his absence, explaining he wanted to spend as much time as he could with his new baby. He praised the Israeli hospital for its commitment to equality and justice while pointing to the values shared by Canada and Israel – democracy, openness, tolerance, respect for the rule of law and, in particular, the desire for peace.

"In this regard, the Liberal Party of Canada will have Israel's back. Not because it is in our political interests to do so at home, but because it is the right thing to do," he stated.

He said support for Israel should cross party lines.

Coincidentally, just a week earlier Trudeau told a local Farsi language weekly newspaper, Salam Toronto, that "[Harper's] stance in matters regarding Israel or the United Nations is highly focused on what will affect his position in the ballots," according to a translation provided by journalist Jonathan Halevi on his blog, Alternative Angle.

In his message at the synagogue, Trudeau quoted former justice minister Irwin Cotler, saying that Canada must help stamp out the new anti-Semitism, which requires it to fully participate in international organizations such as the United Nations.

"We must be present in these institutions to make our case, lest we risk losing by default to the purveyors of hate," he said.

Trudeau expressed support for U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's peace initiatives. "Direct negotiations are the only path" toward a just and enduring peace, he said.

To the delight of many, he concluded his address by wishing everyone a sweet Passover, doing so passably in Hebrew and more clumsily in Yiddish. Be that as it may, the evening was one of celebration as he and other award winners were feted for their commitment to helping others.

Joining Trudeau as 2014 Medal of Merit recipients were Allan Abramovitch and his wife, Jacqueline, as well as Karen Mock, and her husband David Mock.

Dr. Eytan Wirtheim

The Liberal party turned out in great numbers for the event. Headlining the Liberal lovefest was Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne, who brought greetings and praised the Meir Medical Center as "a worthy beacon of inclusion" that "helps human beings in need."

Also present were several Liberal MPPs, former federal cabinet ministers Bill Graham and Joe Volpe, who also serves as the Canadian support group's campaign chair, as well as municipal politicians, including mayoralty candidate David Soknacki.

If a bomb had gone off in Liberal party headquarters that evening, it's likely there'd have been no one around to be hurt.

Which ties into recent developments at the Meir Medical Center itself. Arie Raif, vice-chair and CEO of the Canadian Friends group, noted that Israeli hospitals are on the front line of the country's defence efforts.

As a result of indiscriminate missile attacks, there's a trend developing in the design and construction of Israeli hospitals. Hospitals are going underground.

They are hardening their structures with extra concrete, and architects are putting emergency rooms, intensive care units and operating theatres below ground level, placing these vital facilities out of harm's way – at least for the smaller missiles in their enemies' arsenals – and providing a measure of reassurance to the doctors, nurses and other staff whose work can't stop, even when an air raid warning sounds.

The Meir Medical Center in Kfar Saba is set to become one of the new breed of hardened healing centres. Construction will begin on a new $130-million orthopedic and emergency hospital designed to the new specifications. But constructing underground facilities, with the extra cement, heavy doors, smaller rooms and other costs makes them very expensive – they can cost up to 50 per cent more than a ground-level hospital.

And so, supporters of the hospital are being asked to come forward with a contribution, name a wing, a room or a piece of equipment if they like, but help the hospital continue to serve the people of central Israel.

Last weekend's dinner enabled the hospital to alert its supporters about the good work being done at the facility. Dr. Eytan Wirtheim, the Meir Medical's CEO, was in town for the dinner and to promote the hospital.

Meir Medical is comparable in size to Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre. Located in central Israel, the hospital has 700,000 people in its catchment area. The 863-bed hospital serves 58,400 inpatients a year and performs about 20,000 surgical procedures annually. It is one of the largest emergency hospitals in the country.

Its cardiac electro-physiology unit was funded, in part, with $1.2 million in contributions from Canadian supporters.

The unit is part of the hospital's credo of providing excellent service – and of providing medical services regardless of religion or nationality. Twenty per cent of the hospital's patients and staff are non-Jews. "Israelis, Palestinians, Muslims and Jews all work together at Meir," Wirtheim said.

That has resonated among local supporters, Raif noted. Some 20 per cent of local supporters are not Jewish. They are attracted to the hospital because of its policy of treating all people alike, he said.

Connections between Meir Medical and Canada are also apparent in various research projects, he said. Several Israeli doctors are in Toronto working with colleagues thanks to a number of fellowships, funded by Canadian and Israeli supporters.

There are currently joint projects linking Meir Medical to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, Montreal's Jewish General Hospital and the University of Toronto.

In the last three years, Canadian supporters have raised more than $2.5 million for the hospital. "We think we will raise another $1 million in 2013-14," said Raif.

Meir Medical operates on an annual budget equivalent to $330 million, Wirtheim said, adding that benefactors are free to designate how funds they provide to the hospital are employed. ■

GUEST VOICE

It's all about the size of your cup

RABBI YOSSI MICHALOWICZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The seder begins with the recitation of the Kiddush. There are many laws regarding this step. We're told how much we're required to drink from the kiddush cup, what position we're to be in when drinking the wine, how much we may dilute the strength of the wine, etc. Yet, the Code of Jewish Law tells us something that would seem to be irrelevant to this step – it tells us what the size of the cup should be. The cup should be able to contain a revi'it of wine (approximately four ounces). Why did the rabbis legislate the size of the cup?

There's an age-old question of how we view a cup that's filled halfway to the top. Is the cup half full – the optimist's point of view – or is it half empty – the pessimist's point of view? We have always been taught to be satisfied with our lot and see the cup as half full. But are we happy with that? Who are we fooling? After all, the cup that's half full is simultaneously half empty.

Additionally, we see that King David himself said, in Psalm 23, that "my cup overflows" – so even he states that the overflowing cup is indeed the blessed state to be in. So why be satisfied with less?

I believe that the essential question that a person must ask is not whether one's cup is half full or empty. Rather, we must consider the following: "How large is the size of my cup?" In other words, it's a question of our expectations.

Consider the huge 64-ounce Big Gulp cup one can buy at the local 7-Eleven convenience store. Even if it contains 20 ounces, we'll feel deprived. Yet if we take the contents of that cup and pour it into a kiddush cup that contains the volume of a revi'it, we'll see that our cup is overflowing beyond our wildest dreams!

If we expect God to provide us with constant Big Gulp portions in life, we'll forever struggle to fill our cup and either exhaust ourselves with effort or have to "settle" for a cup that's half full when we really know it's half empty. Or we can choose to lower our expectations and use a reasonably sized cup and see God's bounty overflowing to us.

The seder is an evening to show our gratitude to the Almighty for all the things He does for us. We will review the history of our people and see how much we should be grateful for. However, if we have unreasonable expectations, we will always feel we should have had more. The seder is an evening where we want to shep naches from our children and grandchildren. Many of us are expecting a perfect evening, with all our expectations of a perfect seder being met. But we will only, at best, have a seder that is "half full," and thus really "half empty," so we'll leave disappointed.

King David experienced many trials and tribulations in life, yet he never saw himself with a cup that was not full. I can only imagine that his cup contained a revi'it, so he always experienced feelings of overflowing gratitude.

This is why the rabbis taught us how to have an amazing seder – first check the size of your cup! You will walk away with overflowing feelings of gratitude to God for all your blessings! ■

UJA's Walk with Israel is the largest single-day Israel solidarity Walk in the Diaspora but we can't do it without you, our committed and talented Walk volunteers.

We are looking for Jewish Toronto's best and brightest volunteers to roll up their sleeves and take part in the success of this incredible event.

Becoming a Walk volunteer is easy.

Visit www.walkwithisrael.com/volunteer to view the roles available and select your preference. Or, if you're 19 years of age or older, maybe you'd prefer to be a Walk Marshal, helping to direct traffic along the Walk Route and at the Rest Stops.

Volunteering at UJA's Walk with Israel is sure to be one of the most rewarding and fun days you'll ever experience.

GUEST VOICE

This year slaves, next year free

RABBI JOE KANOFSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When spring is in the air, the bud is on the tree and the temperature is above freezing, I hesitate to get negative. Yet, I can't help wondering about how the very things that are supposed to set us free have a very sneaky way of ensnaring and enslaving us. The benefits of plenty, the freedom of choice and the ease of global communication have somehow become limiters of the exercise of our freedom, rather than vehicles of freedom's expression.

Many or most of us live in a state of material safety and well-being that our forebears would not have imagined possible. A country that shields our well-being and our civil rights not just as citizens, but as Jewish citizens. A standard of health care and a life expectancy that's a leader among world societies. And in the GTA and other Canadian cities, a range of opportunities to learn about and engage in Jewish life that can only be called an embarrassment of riches. How wealthy we are!

Yet, all this begs the question: what are we doing to take advantage of this wealth? How much are we enjoying the dividends of freedom and plenty? At Pesach time, it's worthwhile to think about the material allure, the "fleshpots of Egypt" that kept us reined in by our stomachs, willing to trade freedom for a hearty meal. Part of the problem with a full stomach is that we don't hunger for anything. We have it all! But we don't really enjoy any of it to the fullest.

In a world of endless choice, what do we choose? A few years ago, I read The Paradox of Choice, a book that describes the lengths to which the very notion of consumer choice enslaves us. There are so many choices, so many items and options and possibilities competing for our limited attention that it's sometimes difficult to make any choice at all. I myself have walked into the drugstore in recent years hoping to procure a bottle of shampoo, only to walk out empty-handed, overwhelmed by the choices.

We all know that the largest group among our people is "Jews for nothing." This silent majority are our brothers and sisters who choose nothing. They opt out of even the minimum level of affiliation, the minimum level of identification, the least bit of growth and depth and learning as Jews. What are we doing on a personal level to connect with them? What are we doing to recognize the "Jew for nothing" in each of us, at some level or another?

I've written previously about those people we know who are in contact with everyone but in touch with no one, including themselves. Where technology allows virtually instantaneous global communication, it seems paradoxically very difficult to sit and have a conversation about things that are important to us.

Yet this is precisely what Pesach and the seder offer us: the chance for genuine communication, to sit around the dinner table with our family, with our children (or our inner child) and talk for a few hours about what's most important to us: where we come from, what we are and where we're going.

This year let's let the seder be not an annual chore or empty ritual, but a re-orientation to what we really are, deep down: free Jews, proud of what we are and the nation we belong to, and rejoicing in each other's company and shared commitment. ■

Brain talk series brings neuroscience to community

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We all have those tip-of-the-tongue "senior moments" as we age, especially when trying to recall a name, a number or what we were about to do.

"Senior moments" can be disturbing, but such temporary memory loss is a normal part of aging, the audience was told at a recent talk at the Baycrest winter garden.

In celebration of the Rotman Research Institute's 25th anniversary, Rotman scientists are presenting, throughout the year, a series of short talks on the latest developments in brain and aging, with a focus on bringing neuroscience to members of the community.

Jed Meltzer, a neuro-rehabilitaton scientist at the institute, gave the first talk in the series March 28, speaking to more than 40 community members on the topic, "Can we really fix dementia?"

"The surest sign of real dementia is a change in the person's ability to handle their daily affairs," Meltzer said.

Dementia is a disorder in which people slowly lose their cognitive abilities. It's an umbrella term for a variety of brain disorders. Symptoms may include loss of memory, judgment and reasoning, as well as changes in mood and behaviour. Brain function is affected enough to interfere with a person's ability to function at work, in relationships and in everyday activities.

Dementia is caused by the slow degeneration of brain cells. The cognitive symptoms of dementia vary according to which parts of the brain are affected, and these differ in different types of dementia.

Dr. Jed Meltzer SUSAN MINUK PHOTO

According to a 2012 study commissioned by the Alzheimer Society of Canada, the number of Canadians living with cognitive impairment, including dementia, now stands at 747,000 and will double to 1.4 million by 2031. These figures comprise not only Canadians diagnosed with dementias, including Alzheimer's disease, but also those with cognitive impairment, which frequently leads to the more degenerative forms.

There are ways you can actually decrease your chances of getting dementia.

"The biggest intervention you can make is to take care of your heart with diet, exercise, controlling cholesterol and high blood pressure," Meltzer said. "This can reduce your chances and it can slow down progression.

"The No. 1 controllable factor is cardiovascular health. When you are in your 30s and 40s, doing aerobic exercise has its pay-off decades later. You want to be in as good a shape as you can be earlier in life. That is going to reduce your chances of getting dementia later in life. Walking is also an excellent exercise, and it's easy."

Several diseases cause dementia. "The most common is Alzheimer's. Others include frontotemporal dementia, Parkinson's diseases can include dementia as a symptom, and vascular dementia, which is sort of like mini-strokes, which build up over time," he said.

Some forms of dementia turn out to be treatable. For example, normal pressure hydrocephalus, where there is too much pressure inside the brain, can be relieved with minor surgery.

"If someone is showing signs of cognitive decline, it is always worth getting evaluated. Some 10 per cent of cases turn out to be treatable," Meltzer said.

"There are three goals of research efforts worldwide," he said: "1. Stopping the biological process that causes the disease – the buildup of proteins in the brain cells; 2. Early diagnosis. Goal 1 and goal 2 have to go hand in hand because any effective intervention has to be done early. We need to find this cure for the process and deliver it to people who are going to need it before they really become afflicted with dementia; and 3. Effective treatments to treat the symptoms. We can probably find better medications to slow down the progression and help people cope with the disease longer and, besides medication, we can expect improvements in brain training and possibly from brain stimulation."

The Meltzer lab is focusing on early diagnosis and treating the symptoms. The current study examines the electrical activity of the brain, which may be altered at the earliest stages of dementia. Because dementia progresses gradually over the years, early diagnosis is essential to successfully treating it. The study consists of three components: cognitive testing, magnetoencephalography (MEG) and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI).

The Rotman Research Institute is one of the top five brain research institutes in the world. The primary research focus is on memory and the executive functions of the brain, both in normal aging and in the presence of diseases.

The next brain talk will be April 29 on "An Agatha Christie Mystery: Finding Alzheimer's on the Page," with scientist Regina Joke. ■

Ontario Jewish Archives launches upgraded website

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Ontario Jewish Archives, Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre has launched a new mobile-friendly website. The site includes an interactive map feature called Jewish Landmarks of Ontario, and more than 25,000 entries describing OJA holdings.

Ontariojewisharchives.org went live March 24, and was designed to be accessible to everyone – "our grandparents, our school-aged children, and of course, the scholars of Ontario's Jewish history and heritage," the centre's director Dara Solomon said in a news release.

An Ontario government grant of $49,050 provided about half the funding for the upgrade. The remainder came from community donors and the federation.

Redesigning the site was one of the first things Solomon wanted to do when she became director of the archives in May 2012, OJA archivist Donna Bernardo-Ceriz told The CJN.

The website's "Landmarks" feature focuses on Toronto's Kensington Market/Spadina area, and other places will be added in the future, Bernardo-Ceriz said.

Dara Solomon, Ontario Jewish Archives director

The feature consists of "an interactive map where you can click on points of interest on the map, and a pop-up box appears with a brief history of that site, and then scanned media from our holdings – photographs, audio-visual clips, and documents," she explained.

Other online content includes documents, photos, videos and exhibitions on topics including artists, community leaders, Jewish organizations, anti-Semitism, small Jewish communities, early synagogues, and the Jewish Canadian military experience.

The centre's previous site, designed in the early 2000s, "was good for what it was, and [for] the time," Bernardo-Ceriz said. However, it lacked some "key features," like the new data base and its descriptions of the archives' holdings, almost 4,000 of which can be seen online – enabling users to research, or just browse, from home.

"In the past, when people had a research inquiry, they would call or email us, and we would do the search ourselves to find records that were appropriate for their research. We would be making decisions in many ways on their behalf about what types of records they should be looking at."

Researchers who use the archives include genealogists, academics, students, television production companies, and donors to the centre. Genealogists in particular may be interested in 1925 and 1931 Toronto Jewish city directories with business and residential listings. The directories were on the old website, but "hidden," said Bernardo-Ceriz. "Nobody knew they were there.

"We have such wonderful treasures ... about 5,000 cubic feet of records, about 60,000 photographs, and none of it was really being presented to the community," she added.

"We're really excited to have it up there. I hope people really take advantage of what's on offer. The whole idea is to get it out there to the community so that they know we're mandated with safeguarding the Jewish community's heritage and their history. We want to make sure they have access to it as well."

Solomon stated in the press release, "We hope to make the diversity of the Ontario Jewish experience relevant for a 21st century audience, and to encourage visitors to the website to consider their own pasts and to contribute their voices to this ongoing story."■

Pro-Israel students walk out of Ryerson BDS vote

CJN STAFF

Pro-Israel students at Ryerson University walked out of a student union meeting after the undergraduate body passed a motion advocating boycotts, divestment and sanctions against Israel.

The campus group Students for Justice in Palestine tabled the item at the April 2 annual general meeting of the Ryerson Students Union (RSU). The raucous event at Ryerson's student centre reportedly started 45 minutes late because of an extra-large turnout of more than 100 students.

SJP leaders claimed to have collected some 1,600 signatures on campus in support of the resolution, which calls on the RSU to cut ties with companies that do business in Israel.

Efforts by pro-Israel students to defer the motion to next year or to a student-wide referendum were defeated when discussion was cut short and the resolution was put to a vote. The item wasn't initially on the AGM agenda, but ended up being considered first, because most of the students were apparently there to debate it, the Ryersonian student newspaper reported.

"It's unjust and clearly one-sided. This was not the majority of student body, walking in here we were already a minority," first-year radio and TV arts student Jessie Saunders-Drutz was quoted as saying by the rival Eyeopener newspaper.

"Our side was not heard, and any option to have a referendum or postpone it a year was defeated instantly because of the unequal numbers. This wasn't a debate, there was a predetermined answer before we even we walked into the room, and that's not a democracy."

The meeting reportedly degenerated into shouting on both sides, with anti-BDS students ripping up their voting cards and storming out of the meeting after the resolution passed.

They led a protest outside the room, carrying signs saying "Hate Off Campus" and "RSU Represent Me Too," the Eyeopener reported.

"Ryerson is supposed to be multicultural, and that's the main reason I chose to come here over other universities. But today, on Ryerson campus, I've never felt so belittled and uncomfortable in a room," first-year film student, Julia Bond told the paper. "The RSU is supposed to be unbiased and neutral. But they aren't. They're Palestinian."

In a statement on its Facebook page, SJP said it was "extremely happy with the outcome" adding that it "was very telling of where the campus is in regards to this issue. An 80-per-cent majority never comes easy, and we believe we achieved this through campaigning over the last six months on campus. We reached out to our student body and got signatures from more than 1,600 students endorsing this motion."

SJP president Mohommad Horreya, a fourth-year business student, was buoyed by the result, but decried the ruckus.

"It's unfortunate that this happened and had to end in this way. [The anti-BDS students] should have kept calm and followed order so that the discussion could have continued," he told the Eyeopener.

Hillel@Ryerson strongly condemned the vote.

"BDS is at its very core a manifestation of discrimination as it specifically targets individuals based solely on their nationality," said president Shannon Riley.

"This kind of divisive and toxic campaign does nothing but create a hostile and intolerant environment for Jewish and pro-Israel students on campus. A university is supposed to strive for an atmosphere of respect and tolerance, where open dialogue is encouraged. This cannot exist when there are attempts to isolate a portion of the student body."

She accused the RSU of "taking a stand on divisive Middle East politics instead of focusing on representing students' voices" and commended pro-Israel students "for standing up against this blatant discrimination and for refusing to back down in the face of such a shameful resolution."

Riley added that BDS "has one purpose, which is to demonize and delegitimize the State of Israel. It is an impediment to peace and runs contrary to our core value of academic freedom and the integrity of this university. And that is why not one university administration in all of Canada, including Ryerson, has ever supported a single BDS motion." ■

Three Lev Tahor members awaiting deportation

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has ordered three members of Lev Tahor held in custody pending deportation to Israel.

The three were part of a group of five arrested at the Lev Tahor community outside Chatham, Ont. Two of the five were released prior to the April 4 hearing. Two others weren't present when 20 agents of the Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA), Chatham police and representatives of the Chatham-Kent Child Protection Services raided the community last week.

The IRB ordered Yochanan Lavar, 19, a father of three, removed on April 10. The others are Avraham Kabaz Kashani, 39, and Odel Malka, 30. Removal dates have not yet been set for them.

Guidy Mamann, who represented the three at the hearing, said there is likely nothing that can be done to prevent the removals. However, he said a "global" solution was needed to address the immigration status of the other members of Lev Tahor, the ultra-Orthodox community that moved from Quebec to Ontario last November.

"We have to recognize that we have a community here. They have huge families. Their children are Canadian citizens."

Mamann has been retained to help sort out and consolidate the defence of Lev Tahor members on a number of legal fronts, including immigration issues and allegations of child abuse and neglect. He was scheduled to travel to Windsor earlier this week with two Lev Tahor members who also face immigration issues. Discussions will begin with CBSA but ultimately a decision on the members' status will have to be made by the immigration ministry, he said.

The Lev Tahor members entered the country legally, pose no dangers to the Canadian public and should be allowed to remain on compassionate grounds, he said.

Some of the Lev Tahor children

Mamann said he is putting together a defence team to address allegations of child neglect, none of which have been proven in court.

"My goal is to see parents reunited with their children," said Mamann.

"You see a Jewish kid taken from their parents and it hurts."

Last week, an Ontario court heard a Lev Tahor appeal from a decision that enforced a Quebec court order to apprehend and place into care 14 Lev Tahor children. That case was set to resume on Wednesday of this week.

In yet another development, a 17-year-old member of the community who had been apprehended with her infant in Calgary and placed with a Toronto family, was released. Her baby remained in foster care.

"I left to Calgary with my baby with the sole purpose of saving my baby from being a life orphan for no reason," she stated in a public email. "The [Children's Aid Society] is worried that this point will be used against them... in court, so they chose to release me 12 hours before the hearing starts."

About 250 members of Lev Tahor left Quebec late last year in the midst of an investigation by the province's child protection authorities into allegations of child abuse and substandard education. A Quebec court subsequently ordered 14 children from a number of Lev Tahor families removed and placed with foster parents.

To date, Lev Tahor members have been represented by a number of lawyers on an ad hoc basis.

"What is lacking here is a clear direction and co-ordination," Mamann said. "Lev Tahor members are so overwhelmed they're frozen where they are and can't make any decisions."

Previous lawyers did not receive proper instructions, and the Lev Tahor members "let immigration issues slide."

Their financial resources are also drained.

"It's a holy mess," said Mamann.

Going on the offensive, Mamann accused law enforcement and immigration officials of acting in a "disproportionate" and "backhanded" manner.

"This is a group that's pretty benign. Out of 200 people, seven had immigration problems, and all could have been fixed pretty well."

Mamann said the raid coincided with a meeting in Toronto between Lev Tahor representatives and immigration authorities that was meant to resolve the issues. He questioned the timing of the raid, suggesting it was meant to further disorient the group before the court hearing, Mamann said.

Lev Tahor spokesman Nachman Helbrans said he was angry at the arrests. "It is outrageous that while 200,000 persons are officially known to be undocumented in Toronto area alone, the CBSA found it necessary to make a community-wide raid with extensive forces when it was not any suspicion of a crime or wrongdoing," he said.

Mamann said that given the apprehension of 14 kids, the constant unannounced visit by child-care workers and the recent raid, the Lev Tahor "children are under tremendous stress. They want to be with their parents, and their parents want them back."

He said one family was separated after being returned from Trinidad. They had been en route to Guatemala, where another Lev Tahor family now resides after fleeing there last month ahead of child custody hearings.

When the father "finally saw his child, he was overcome and collapsed." He's undergoing medical care because of the strain, Mamann added.

Mamann questioned why the CBSA would use its limited resources to go after Lev Tahor members who pose no threat to the public when there could be as many as one million undocumented people living in Canada.

Mamann was particularly scathing in denouncing Denis Baraby, the director of Quebec's department of youth protection for the Laurentians region. Baraby told the Gazette in Montreal that he would ask for the removal of all children in the Lev Tahor community.

"I think the community is preparing a mass move," he told the Gazette. "If we want to protect the children that are in the community, we need to start working on the exit of the 114 other children."

"It's pure madness," said Mamann.

If there are serious allegations against a particular parent, then the individual case should be dealt with, he said, but to threaten apprehension of an entire community's children is unprecedented.

"I've never seen that in western civilization," Mamann added. ■

Young Jews want open discussion on Israel

JANICE ARNOLD
MONTREAL
jarnold@cjnews.ca

A small group of Jewish students and other young people gathered at the McGill University law faculty April 2 in the hope of setting an example for a new openness in the community toward diverse opinions on Israel and Zionism.

The panel discussion was organized and moderated by Rachel Deutsch, a McGill graduate and social worker, who believes Jews, especially the young, should be able to publicly express their critical or simply questioning views on Israel, as well as the relationship between the Diaspora and the Jewish state, or their own Jewish identity.

She wants to encourage a "respectful conversation" between these Jews and those with mainstream opinions.

Deutsch said such discussions are usually private, among family and friends, and even then, they're fraught with tension. Those who do speak out risk – or fear – being ostracized from the community, subjected to scorn and branded as troublemakers. It may even strain personal relationships, she said.

The result, she said, is the sense that some topics are taboo, and it's better to remain silent.

The evening saw a rare instance of a self-described Zionist sitting together with an anti-Zionist on the panel. Menachem Freedman, a "progressive" Zionist, and Sarah Woolf, who is active in promoting the Palestinian cause, including Israeli Apartheid Week, sat together at the table without any conflict between them.

Freedman, a law student, is a native of Montreal who studied at a yeshiva in Israel and served in the Israeli Defence Forces. He serves on the board of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Woolf, a McGill graduate, is an editor at the Montreal Review of Books and a researcher for the online Museum of Jewish Montreal.

They were joined by another law student, Avishai Sharon, an Israeli who has been living in Montreal for the past three years, who served in the IDF, attended Hebrew University of Jerusalem and was engaged in Israeli-Palestinian dialogue; and Sam Bick, a graduate of the Jewish day school system who is now involved with an organization advocating for social justice in the Middle East.

Freedman said apathy is a growing problem among young Jews whose views on Israel or the conflict are outside the mainstream, and that isn't good for the continuity of the community.

"We have to create a more inclusive Jewish community in Montreal, or there will be more alienation," he said.

Bick said his 12 years at Solomon Schechter Academy and Bialik High School did not prepare him for critical thought. "Political Zionism was not questioned. We were not even aware it was a choice, but it is a choice, and that has to be recognized... We have to create more space for dissent within the community."

Sharon said discussion of this kind is inhibited because soon the argument turns to "the existential threat" faced by Israel from the Arabs.

Both he and Woolf regret that, according to them, fear underlies Jews' relationship to Israel and frames the debate.

"I want to disentangle fears about the Jewish identity from Zionism, it isn't necessarily the answer," she said. "I do not want my fear to be responsible for someone else's oppression, and I think that's what is going on."

Deutsch, who works at a native women's centre, said she is inspired by other communities that have overcome their reluctance to address painful, even shameful, issues by talking about it openly.

She is working on a film in which young Jews with critical or questioning views on Israel and Zionism and what it means to be Jewish express themselves candidly.

Deutsch had hoped to have more panelists and audience members with mainline positions about Israel and Zionism, and had reached out to Hillel and other community organizations to participate, but received a lukewarm response. ■

Holocaust education inadequate in Quebec: study

CJN STAFF
MONTREAL

A Université de Montréal study has found that Holocaust education in Quebec high schools, especially French ones, is "often superficial and partial," due largely to a lack of adequate history textbooks.

The study by Sivane Hirsch and Marie McAndrew said the situation "prevents Quebec's students from fully grasping the impact of this historical event on contemporary society."

The Holocaust is mentioned in the curriculum for the mandatory History and Citizenship Education program, but only in passing, and at least two of the prescribed textbooks make no reference to it at all. The authors are also critical that teachers are not provided with clear guidelines on how to treat the Holocaust, how to define it and explain its historical significance.

"Partial representations of the Holocaust risk being as problematic as false ones," the study concludes, "for both can lead to similar misunderstandings or encourage negative attitudes towards its victims."

> [Education] is often superficial and partial

One book discusses the concentration camps from a longer historical perspective globally, without ever specifically speaking of Nazi concentration camps, they found.

"It is regrettable that only one textbook, History in Action, presents the Jewish resistance, by showing a photo of 'Jewish fighters during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising', the study states.

"From Yesterday to Tomorrow is the only [textbook] that deals with the importance of teaching the Holocaust today, mentioning the 'duty to remember' horrors, as well as the people who resisted them."

McAndrew is the Canada Research Chair in Education and Ethnic Relations, and Hirsch is a postdoctoral fellow in her department. ■

Oliver to end deficit and broaden ties with Israel

DAVID LAZARUS
MONTREAL
dlazarus@cjnews.ca

Joe Oliver

In his first media interview since being appointed finance minister, Joe Oliver told The CJN he will seek to "broaden" Canada-Israel investment ties as well as balance the federal budget by next year in a steady-as-she-goes approach to lower taxes and "create job growth from coast to coast."

Oliver also strongly defended himself against an Opposition accusation that he's a climate change denier.

"I was disappointed to hear that," Oliver said in the half-hour telephone interview, referring to comments by New Democratic Party leader Thomas Mulcair, who had called Oliver's appointment to the prestigious finance post an "embarrassment" due to his supposed denial of climate change.

"I do not deny climate change. It's a question of what policy should be. Policy, that's all. Not every project that exploits natural resources hurts the environment."

Oliver, 73, a Montreal native and three-year MP for the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, described himself as a "late bloomer" in politics after four decades in finance.

His first days in the new job, he said, have been spent in briefing rooms, talking to his provincial counterparts and appointing political staff.

Oliver has visited Israel six times, three of them in his previous post as natural resources minister before succeeding Jim Flaherty March 19 to become Canada's first Jewish finance minister.

That appointment, Oliver said, came out of the blue. Flaherty had been finance minister for eight years, since day one of the Tory government under Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

"I was on a flight to Vancouver when the call came through," Oliver related. "I had no idea what it was about, and I had no idea Jim Flaherty was going to resign."

Nevertheless, Oliver sees himself as well suited to his new role and the culmination of his many years of experience.

"It will make me more effective," he said.

Asked if he now realizes he had become the de facto "minister of the Jewish community" as the result of his appointment, Oliver laughed.

"I am proud to have the chance to serve all Canadians. There are substantial numbers from the Jewish community in my riding, and I am have very grateful for their support and everyone's support," he said. "It's been very meaningful to me."

More concretely, Oliver has a plan of action as finance minister.

Bilateral friendship with Israel to continue: Oliver

He will balance the federal budget in 2015, he said. Canada is in an enviable position, because "our net debt is half that on average compared to other members of the G7 nations."

As the country's demographics change, it will also be important to make sure that seniors can continue being part of the workforce if they want to be, he said.

"We want to make sure that those who work are working because they want to, not because they have to [for financial reasons]."

Oliver expects the unprecedented level of bilateral friendship and co-operation that has flourished with Israel under Harper's Tories will continue. (Oliver accompanied the prime minister on his historic first visit to the Jewish state in January.)

Regarding how that goal might be furthered on his watch, Oliver said the focus will be on "broadening the investment relationship" to fuller potential, adding "we are now in our early days and we have to see how that can be done."

He said there's no reason bilateral trade between Canada and Israel could not increase substantially from its current level of $1.5 billion.

Oliver said he doesn't regret using the word "radical" to describe certain environmental groups. In his view, they're so dogmatic that they "oppose every single major project" out of a perceived threat to the environment that's not necessarily backed up by evidence.

When he was natural resources minister, he was a strong supporter of the controversial XL Keystone pipeline, which was opposed by environmental groups.

He noted he also worked closely with Israel in providing expertise on tapping vast natural gas deposits off its Mediterranean coastline and on high-tech innovation. ■

Stately presentation

Toronto Holocaust survivor George Brady and family last week presented former U.S. secretary of state Madeleine Albright with a copy of a book of poems by Hanus Hachenburg, for which she wrote the foreword. Brady and Hachenburg were contributors to Vedem, a magazine written by boys interned in the Terezin (Theresienstadt) ghetto during World War II. Hachenburg continued to write until his death in Auschwitz. The Czech-born Albright was in Toronto for the Global Progress Dinner, hosted by the Canadian Centre for Progressive Policy.

Halifax philanthropist to be honoured by JNF

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

Halifax businessman and philanthropist Dr. Jim Spatz will be the honoured guest at the 2014 Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner May 22.

Proceeds from the gala event will be directed to the Jim Spatz Bike Path at Tel Aviv's Independence Park, the first time JNF will have a project in Tel Aviv. Journalist and linguist Rex Murphy will be keynote speaker.

Spatz, 65, the son of Holocaust survivors, arrived with his parents at Halifax's Pier 21 in 1949 at age 11 months. He graduated from Dalhousie University's medical school and was a general practitioner in Dartmouth, N.S. for five years before taking residency training at McGill. After 10 years working in the emergency room at Montreal's Jewish General Hospital, he returned to Halifax to join the family real estate development business in 1988.

Now recognized as one of Nova Scotia's leading real estate developers, Spatz grew up around the business started by his post-World War II immigrant father, Simon who started as a small grocer and then branched into apartment ownership, the forerunner of today's multi-million dollar real estate empire.

"There was never any expectation that I would have to come back to the family business," said the chair and CEO of Southwest Properties. "In fact, as he'd spend Sunday cleaning his store, my father always told me he wanted better things for me."

Yet, as Simon Spatz grew his grocery store into building ownership and then development, he'd share information with his son, especially how he looked at the financial aspects of buildings he was considering acquiring.

"And he'd take me to his construction sites on weekends and I found that fabulously interesting. That's what really hooked me. I became addicted to the smell of freshly poured concrete at a young age," said Spatz. "It moved from back of mind to the front that I'd return."

He made the transition at about age 40, moving "from doing something that I was pretty good at, to something where my significant qualification was that I was the boss's son."

He continued to learn from his dad, a man then in his mid-70s, who worked into his 80s.

Today, the doctor-turned-developer has expanded the company's portfolio and geographic reach. Spatz has led the company in the development and acquisition of investment property throughout Atlantic Canada and beyond, increasing Southwest's size in terms of both assets and revenue by more than 10-fold.

Spatz grew up in household of immigrants

He has been involved in community activities for decades, both Jewish and secular.

"He's been a wonderful supporter of the Atlantic Jewish Council and the State of Israel," said AJC executive director Jon Goldberg. "He's been a member of our board and management committee for many years and has been on several AJC missions to Israel."

Halifax lawyer Victor Goldberg, a past chair of AJC, worked for more than 10 years as Camp Kadimah co-chair with Spatz.

"I did the grunt work but Jim's keen eye for detail and love for the environment meant he was great for our physical plant and camp beautification," Goldberg said. "On each trip to Israel, his interest in 'green' projects was evident, the projects you think of when you think of JNF."

Spatz is the perfect honoree for the JNF dinner because of that interest, said Goldberg.

A self-admitted perfectionist, Spatz added, "growing up in the house of immigrants, my parents always hated waste.

> Wonderful supporter of Atlantic Jewish Council and Israel

That's carried on to my business philosophy. My father always built using good materials that would last for a long time, and always aimed for good energy efficiency."

Southwest's recent award of LEED Gold for The Grainery Lofts, the first multi-unit building east of Montreal to gain that designation for meeting LEED sustainability standards, is "a continuation of how my father developed his building, always aiming for efficient buildings with high life-cycle value."

He grew up with a sense of gratitude for being in Canada and the Halifax community. His parents instilled in him the understanding that those who can, should give back.

Spatz sits on the board of the Beth Israel Synagogue. He is a lifetime director of Halifax's Neptune Theatre and, in 2010, was appointed by Premier Darrell Dexter to serve on the Premier's Advisory Council on the Economy. He is also an active participant of the World Presidents' Organization.

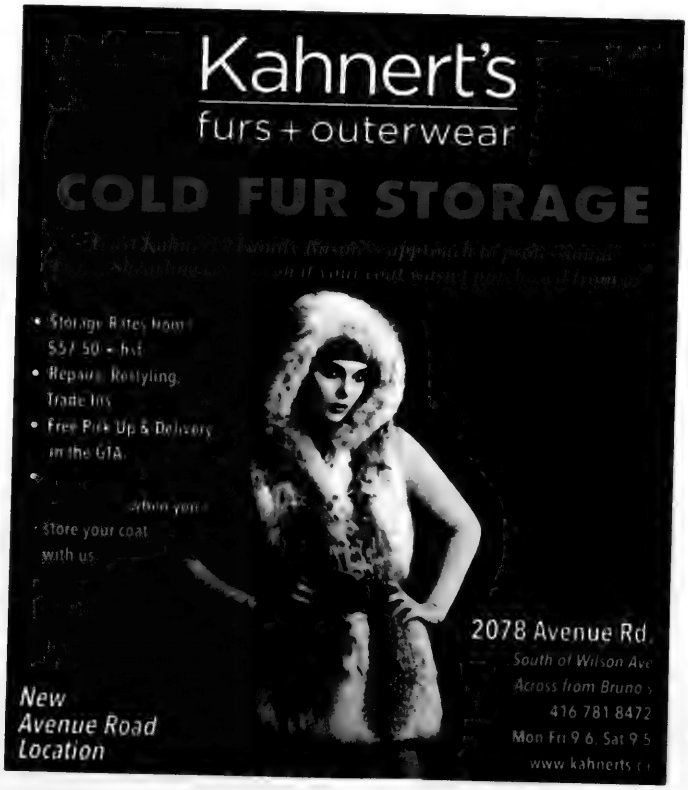
In 2014, Spatz will conclude a five-year term as chair of the board of governors at Dalhousie University, following his appointment to the board in 2001.

He has funded the Simon and Riva Spatz Chair in Jewish Studies, in the Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences at Dalhousie. The program in Jewish Studies will start in 2015-2016.

The Spatz Theatre at Citadel High School in Halifax was dedicated in his family's name three years ago.

"It's a great honour that JNF is recognizing me [at the first JNF dinner in Halifax in 18 years]," said Spatz. "I'm thrilled to help re-launch the dinner, and hope it's not another 18 years before there's another one."

Tickets for the dinner are available through JNF Atlantic Co-ordinator Sue David at Atlantic@JNF.ca or 902-444-4563. ■



Protest tries to shut down pro-Israel gay activist

JANICE ARNOLD
JARNOLD@CJNEWS.CA
MONTREAL

The man dubbed "the mayor" of the gay Jewish party scene in New York received a less-than-cordial reception in Montreal.

Jayson Littman, the founder of He'bro, which organizes gay social and cultural events, had his talk at Hillel House on March 27 drowned out by protesters.

His scheduled presentation on "Out in Israel" drew a flood of objection on social media days in advance and a score of demonstrators at the event.

The most vocal opponent of his appearance beforehand was the Centre for Gender Advocacy, an independent, but student-funded, organization at Concordia University, which describes its mandate as promoting gender equality and empowerment, particularly among "marginalized communities."

The approximately 20 noisy demonstrators identified themselves as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid.

The controversy led Queer Concordia, the main LGBTQ group on campus, to withdraw its support for the event earlier that day, said Michelle Soicher, a fellow of the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA), the event's main sponsor.

Jayson Littman

Littman, who recorded the incident and posted it on YouTube, said some 20 people showed up and began chanting about Israel's occupation and oppression of the Palestinians as he was about to speak.

"They demanded that I leave the premises and that the lecture be cancelled," said Littman, who added he was "a bit nervous." He said they began moving closer to him and gesturing with their hands, which Littman interpreted as an attempt to "provoke some kind of physical confrontation. But everyone on our side remained really calm."

The protesters weren't ejected, but were given the opportunity to stay if they behaved. Security guards moved the meeting to another room, stopping the demonstrators, who continued to be disruptive, from coming into the new space, he said.

They demanded to be let in, shouting that this was like a "checkpoint" in Israel, Littman recalled. Eventually, they were escorted out of Hillel House, and he went ahead with his scheduled talk before an audience of about 20.

A leaflet they left behind said, "Under the guise of speaking about LGBTQ issues in Israel, this event – its speaker, sponsors and hosts – are attempting to excuse and promote violence and hatred toward Palestinians (including Palestinian queers) and the ongoing occupation and colonization of Palestinian territory."

The event is part of "an aggressive public relations campaign to market Israel as an oasis of gay tolerance and democracy in the Mideast, surrounded by 'backward' countries where gays have no rights. The campaign is not about supporting queers in Palestine or elsewhere in the Mideast who are resisting homophobia."

Soicher described comments on the event's Facebook page as "hateful, rude and petty." Few addressed the topic at hand: LGBTQ rights in the Middle East.

Gender Advocacy also accuses Israel of "pinkwashing," which it describes as Israel's use of "its relative... acceptance of queers to reinforce its position as the 'Middle East's only democracy'" to deflect attention from alleged abuses of Palestinians' human rights. Gender Advocacy endorses Israeli Apartheid Week, which took place at Concordia and other Montreal universities in March.

The U.S.-based CAMERA is a pro-Israel group that monitors media coverage of Israel and the Middle East. Soicher, a second-year theatre student, is one of 27 North American university students (one of two in Canada) who are CAMERA fellows this year. They try to offer balance to anti-Israel activity on campus.

She began working to bring Littman to Concordia back in September.

Her goal was to have him speak to a broad audience on campus about the situation of the LGBTQ community in Israel in comparison with neighbouring countries.

She partnered with Queer Concordia, which agreed to have its name associated with the event and to promote it among its more than 1,000-person Facebook invitation list, as well as book space on campus. It wasn't able to secure space, but that was not due to the nature of Littman's talk, Soicher believes. Hillel House is off campus, on Stanley Street.

The intent was to steer the discussion away from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and overt politics, Soicher said, and encourage a dialogue that she thought would be of interest to the greater Concordia LGBTQ community.

Her aim, she said, was to present a positive side of Israel that's little heard on campus. Although pro-Palestinian activity is not as vitriolic as it was years ago at Concordia, it is pervasive, she added, and has become "academically valid," noting the Concordia Graduate Students' Association last year endorsed boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel.

"It's cool to be pro-Palestinian," Soicher said. "But I didn't realize until now how strong the anti-Israel feeling is."

Littman, 36, is the former New York director of A Wider Bridge, an organization, Soicher said, that seeks to foster connections between the LGBTQ community in Israel and North America. He has also led LGBTQ Taglit-Birthright trips to Israel.

The reason Queer Concordia gave her for pulling out is that it "wants to remain neutral," but Soicher believes it "bowed to pressure from those who wanted to skew this event into something that it was not."

Queer Concordia declined to comment to The CJN about its decision.

Soicher does not blame Queer Concordia and respects what it did. "I'm not angry at all. Their heart was in the right place...They didn't want to. I know they felt terrible," she said.

Littman, who speaks on other campuses in the United States, said this was the most hostile reception he has ever received. "I have had threatening messages on social media, but obviously when people are in your face, it's different."

If the protesters had stayed, he said they would have heard that he doesn't portray Israel as a haven for gays, but as a democracy whose courts have allowed gays to win rights, as they have in the West.

"The one reason the Israeli government promotes Israel as gay-friendly is capitalism. It wants to bring in tourism." ■

New centre planned for Jewish Youth Network

CJN STAFF

The Jewish Youth Network of Ontario announced last week that a property has been purchased for a new campus on Bathurst Street, just north of Highway 407, in Thornhill.

The state-of-the-art campus will be named the Miriam and Larry Robbins Jewish Youth Centre and has been dedicated by Larry Robbins, principal partner of Erin Mills Development Corporation and Great Gulf Homes.

Robbins, along with his family, is a longtime friend and supporter of JYN. At a recent celebration, hosted at the home of Allen and Brenlee Gales, Robbins was recognized for his devoted commitment and outstanding contribution to Jewish youth, and renderings for the building project were unveiled.

The new centre, slated to open in 2015, will include a sports lounge, youth cafe, classrooms, social space, basketball court, and playground.

As a fund-matching fundraiser, Robbins topped up his donation with an additional matching grant of $540,000 to kick-start this unique project. ■

Brothers recount grandfather's role in saving Jews

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@cjnews.com

In 1972, Jose Arturo Castellanos was living the quiet life of a retired diplomat when acclaimed novelist Leon Uris came knocking on his door.

Uris wanted to speak to him about World War II and Castellanos' role in it – specifically how he used his position as a diplomat to save Jews.

A native of El Salvador, Castellanos shared his countrymen's modesty and didn't particularly like to blow his own horn, said two of his grandchildren, Alvaro and Boris Castellanos. Their grandfather's exploits were not widely known at the time outside of family circles.

That was about to change, as Uris' subsequent interview drew widespread attention to Castellanos' key role in drawing up citizenship papers that saved the lives of an estimated 40,000 Jews during the Holocaust.

Castellanos was subsequently named as a Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem, taking his place alongside wartime heroes like Raul Wallenberg and Oskar Schindler.

Today, the Castellanos brothers live in Toronto. Their grandfather is long dead, but the two are hoping to keep his memory alive through two films they are making about him. The first, a 15-minute documentary, is already complete. They will present it on April 29, two days after Yom Hashoah, at the House of Quality Jerusalem, a centre for artists and cultural life in the Holy City. A three-minute trailer for the film can be viewed at http://igg.me/at/wayoftherighteous.

They are currently working on a full-length, 90-minute film that they hope to complete in a year or two, if they can get the funding for it.

The brothers travelled to Israel last year to interview survivors. They've also met their grandfather's diplomatic colleagues, and they've talked to historians.

They think there may be a Canadian connection to the story. Given that many of the Jews their grandfather helped were from Hungary, and there is a substantial Hungarian Jewish population in Toronto, the brothers are hoping that anyone with a tale to tell will come forward, and perhaps be included in the film.

"We were thinking, what are the chances that someone in Canada was saved by one of these documents?" Boris said.

For the brothers, their grandfather's deeds have particular meaning, and not just because they are proud he saved many lives.

"We are Salvadorans rescued by Canada from a very bloody civil war," said Alvaro, 44. "To have a Canadian angle to the story, by people who have been rescued, is very important to us."

"That is a powerful part of the film," added Boris, 40.

THE PHONY DEBATE OVER LEGISLATING "JOINT CUSTODY"

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP Family Lawyer & Mediator for 32 years

Bill C-560, moved to second reading in Parliament on March 25. If passed on third reading with Royal Assent, Conservative MP Maurice Vellacott's private member's bill will amend Canada's Divorce Act to create a rebuttable presumption of equal shared parenting (ESP.) ESP would mean parents from a divorced union have an equal role in raising their children, unless one parent can prove why this should not be the case.

Barbara Kay recently championed this legislation in the National Post (Wed. March 19/14) claiming that this draft legislation will cure the problems in the family law system. She describes it as very adversarial system for high-conflict cases, whereby one parent (usually the mother) "wins" primary residence for the children, producing injustice, heartbreak and financial ruin on a massive scale.

She also quotes Toronto lawyer Brian Ludmer who claims that in Australia, ESP, in combination with related measures such as increased use of family mediation services, has resulted in 72 % of parents now being able to resolve post-divorce parenting arrangements without the use of legal services.

However, Helen Rhodes, a Law Professor at the University of Melbourne reviews an empirical study of the 2006 Australian legislation that is similar to Canada's Bill C-560 in a paper found on the internet entitled "The Dangers of Shared Care Legislation: Why Australia Needs (Yet More) Family Law Reform." She concludes that "the reforms have been successful in producing an increase in "substantially shared care arrangements" since the legislation came into force. At the same time, however, the research indicates that a significant number of these arrangements are characterized by intense parental conflict, and that shared care of children is a key variable in affecting poor emotional outcomes for children. " Among studies she cites was the "MacIntosh data" which revealed that a significant proportion of the children in the sample, shared care was a source of "psychological strain" "where the key factor ... was the presence of ongoing conflict between the parents." She identified such EPS legislation as the source of the harmful care arrangements they found. Accordingly, various family law lawyers argue against legal presumptions about children's interests.

By example, Tennessee Lawyer Francis King penned an article dated April 6, 2013 called "Tennessee Moves Toward Equal Parenting Time...But Not So Fast." Apparently, in 2011 the Tennessee Legislature enacted T.C.A. 36-6-106, which provides a version of EPS, namely that "in taking into account the child's best interests, the court shall order a custody arrangement that permits both parents to enjoy the maximum participation possible in the life of the child consistent with the factors set out below, the location of the residences of the parents, the child's need for stability and all other relevant factors etc." Apparently, some Tennessee courts have interpreted this new law to indicate a presumption of joint custody in the absence of "clear and convincing evidence that it would be inappropriate." However, Mr. King notes that the problem with the Tennessee legislation is the law's criteria by which parenting time is then defined is so broad that the exceptions easily swallow the presumption of joint custody in any given case. He cites an example of a recent decision where the father drank excessively at least six nights per week and had posted pictures of himself and the children with his girlfriend on the internet while he was still married: "his past conduct hurt him severely on the parenting time issue" notwithstanding the "presumption" of joint custody.

As a Toronto lawyer who has practiced family law for 33 years, I find this debate between pro and anti EPS legislation, to be phony and irrelevant, although clearly an honest one. In the real world of the family courts, Judges makes decisions based on the facts of each case albeit within the context of the law. They will continue making decisions based on those facts, far less then on "presumptions." Moreover, what many pro-EPS lawyers forget is that under section 20 of Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act (CLRA) and similar provincial legislation across Canada, we already have EPS legislation for non-married parents and couples who are already divorced. It reads in part as follows "...the father and the mother of a child are equally entitled to custody of a child." The same section only suspends that right in section 20(4) if on the separation of the parties a child lives with only one of them "with the consent, implied consent or acquiescence of the other parent" or by "[written] separation agreement or court order." But if that does not happen, the Court presumes equal and joint custody. Moreover, for married couples, section 16(10) of the Divorce Act already imposes on the courts an obligation that "in making an order [concerning custody] shall give effect to the principle that a child of the marriage should have as much contact with each spouse as is consistent with the best interest of the child, and for that purpose, shall take into consideration the willingness of the person for whom custody is sought to facilitate such contact." Yes, unlike section 20 of the Children's Law Reform Act, the test for married couples getting a divorce, appears to be more about "best interests" and not a "presumption of joint custody." However, even in Canada's Divorce Act, the Court must look towards "maximizing contact" when assessing a child's best interests.

More importantly, my experience concerning the difference of "presumptions" in these statues is that the Courts dispose of custody cases irrespective of these differences i.e. as between unmarried vs. married couples. It is true that the Divorce Act for married couples uses a different presumption, one of "best interests." But the presumptions have made little difference "on the ground" in most cases.

So what factors influence a decision in custody cases, especially in high conflict cases, if not such presumptions? Many other factors: the status quo, the experience of one's lawyer, the strategy used to present the facts, whether a parenting assessment is ordered, the identity of the assessor, money for legal fees, whether legal aid will fund the case, which Judge or Judges are involved, the past conduct of the parents, whether there are child protection issues, whether the children have any disabilities, the parenting time they have devoted to the children, shared with the other parent and willingness to share.

Most importantly, which parent is really willing to listen?

To conclude, passing legislation with "presumptions" in an attempt to cure the insane costs and delays associated with high conflict family law cases is like trying to waive a magic wand at a high speed train before it runs you over. Much more creative ideas with better funded strategies are sorely required. But to speculate on such solutions will require a different article.

Castellanos was exiled to Mexico after the war

Not only are they reaching out to survivors who personally benefited from the documents their grandfather provided, they are asking survivors' children to come forward with their stories, or perhaps with the original wartime documents they may have come across in their parents' files. These could be a compelling visual representation of his exploits, they said.

When Castellanos was assigned to the El Salvadoran diplomatic corps in the late 1930s, there was little to suggest he would play an important role in saving so many lives. He had been a bit of a trouble maker back in El Salvador, advocating democracy, so the fascist regime dispatched him to Europe in 1937, where they thought he couldn't cause much trouble, Alvaro said.

He was first assigned as part of a weapons procurement team, but was later appointed consul general in Liverpool, England.

In 1941, Castellanos was assigned to Hamburg, Germany, where he issued visas to Jews to enable them to leave the country. Later he named George Mandel-Mantello as first secretary, a fictitious post that didn't exist in the Salvadoran foreign service. Mandel was a Hungarian Jewish businessman whom Castellanos had met earlier in his career. To make his name more Spanish, Mandel changed it to Mantello.

In issuing citizenship documents to European Jews, Castellanos was violating instructions from his government. Later, he would tell his family, "Anybody else would do the same. It was part of my job," Alvaro recalled.

Clearly, his Salvadoran modesty played a role in downplaying his achievements, but his flouting of the rules could have gotten him into deep trouble. Their grandfather, however, was disaffected with the country's dictatorship, so his reaction was "to say screw you, Fascists," Alvaro explained.

For the next two to three years, after being reassigned to Geneva, he and Mandel-Mantello issued life-saving documents to Jews facing deportation and death.

> Our Jewish friends and clients who found out we were in research for our documentary really encouraged us to go to Israel and start our film project

Jews in Budapest in possession of the papers could find refuge in international safe houses, such as the Glass House, a former glass factory in which the Swiss government harboured thousands of Jews who possessed Salvadoran papers and those of other countries.

"Granddad arranged the documents, and Mantello found Jews to be helped," Alvaro said.

After the war, Castellanos returned to El Salvador but was exiled to Mexico for advocating democracy. In 1950, he was reappointed to the diplomatic corps. He retired in 1956 and died in 1977 at age 86.

Alvaro conceived of the documentary 12 years ago, based on the stories the boys had heard since childhood. The project was put on hold after their mother suffered a stroke, but it was revived thanks in part to the encouragement of their Jewish friends and clients.

"Our Jewish friends and clients who found out we were in research for our documentary really encouraged us to go to Israel and start our film project," Alvaro said.

"For me, that brought the whole thing back," Boris said. "Some Jewish friends are the grandchildren of Holocaust survivors."

Now, the brothers, filmmakers and artists, have put their event planning business on hold – though they still do work for longstanding clients like ORT Toronto and Ve'ahavta – and they're focusing their attention on their film project.

If they succeed in getting the funds to complete the full-length documentary, their grandfather's remarkable story will reach an even larger audience, Salvadoran modesty or no modesty. ■

Canadian woman headed Hawaiian federation

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Enid Evelyn Cohen Lichter, the first female head of the Jewish Federation of Hawaii, always marched to her own drummer.

Enid, who died of old age in Phoenix, Ariz., on Feb. 7 at 97, was a philanthropist who supported Jewish organizations in Canada and the United States. A native Torontonian, she was a feminist in a time when options for women were limited. She was also a free spirit who went where her heart led her, sometimes to her parents' chagrin.

Enid's parents were Essie and Arthur Cohen, philanthropists whose donation to Mount Sinai Hospital built the hospital's lobby. The couple's picture still hangs in the Mount Sinai lobby today.

The lobby is dedicated to Jacob Cohen, Arthur's father, who was Canada's first Jewish magistrate. Enid's father, Arthur Cohen, who died in 1975, was a Canadian movie industry pioneer. President of Holy Blossom Temple from 1928 to 1931, Cohen was a founding member of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, which became the United Jewish Appeal.

Arthur and Essie Cohen's disapproval rained down on their daughter's head when, as the mother of a young child, Enid decided to divorce her first husband, Albert Krangle. Divorce was considered quite daring in the 1930s, said Daryl Collier, Enid's granddaughter. It stigmatized women and divorce laws were strict.

Enid fell in love with Robert Shapiro, and in 1938, she left Canada, with two-year-old Patricia in tow, to join him in New Jersey. She married Shapiro when her divorce finally came through in 1941. She became a military wife, said Collier, adding that Shapiro was "the love of Enid's life."

The couple travelled a lot, and Enid, who had studied at Wellesley College in Massachusetts in an era when not many women went to university, wrote a travel guide for women.

"She didn't believe in a woman behind her man," Collier said. "She had a voice."

Enid Evelyn Cohen Lichter

In the 1960s, when the couple's family had grown to include two more children, Shapiro decided to divorce Enid because he wanted a "change of lifestyle," Collier said. "She was devastated."

Enid's feisty response to heartbreak was to take a trip around the world, to have an adventure, Collier said. She stopped in Honolulu, where a friend fixed her up with a dinner date with Martin Lichter, whom she ended up marrying.

In Hawaii, Enid volunteered for the Jewish Federation of Hawaii. She was named president of the federation in the mid-1960s, the first woman to hold that position, and she held it until the late 1980s.

"She raised tons of money and was a prominent figure in Hawaii," Collier said.

"She was career-minded. Had she been born at a different time, she would have had a powerful career. Working with the federation was her outlet."

Up until her death, Enid supported Jewish community organizations in the United States and Canada, including Mount Sinai Hospital and Holy Blossom Temple.

"She was always proud to be a Jewish Canadian," Collier said.

The motivation for Enid's philanthropy in the Jewish community can be summed up by one of her favourite sayings, from Hillel: "If not now, when? If I am not for myself, then who will be for me."

"In every part of her life, she lived by that," Collier said.

Giving to those less fortunate was an idea that Enid instilled into her grandchildren. "That's how I live my life," Collier said.

She remembers her "Gran" as a strong woman who believed in being independent at a time when women were very dependent on men.

"She was my role model," Collier said.

Enid Evelyn Cohen Lichter is survived by her daughters, Patricia Shenker and Ronny Perin, six grandchildren and five great-grandchildren. ■

Knesset hosts play on Begin by Canadian playwright

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@cjnews.com

In researching the life and times of the late Menachem Begin, playwright Gordie Wiseman uncovered something quite unexpected.

As he was going through the archives at the Menachem Begin Heritage Center in Jerusalem, he came across a letter from Albert Einstein. The renowned physicist had written to the New York Times in 1948 "vilifying Begin, when he was first coming to the United States."

That wasn't so odd, reasoned Wiseman, considering Einstein and Begin came from opposite ends of the political spectrum.

But for Wiseman there was another, karmic aspect to uncovering the letter.

Many years before, he had written a one-man play under his pen name Gabriel Emanuel, which was called Einstein. It had a successful run in Toronto theatres and internationally.

Einstein's letter turned up while he was contemplating another one-man play, this one called, Mr. Begin. That play, featuring renowned Israeli actor Danny Steg, is currently making the rounds in theatres across Israel.

A few weeks ago, Mr. Begin was performed in the Knesset before an audience of parliamentarians and cabinet ministers, including former Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

A number of Begin's elderly colleagues were also in attendance as was Begin's daughter, Hasya.

It turns out, there's an appetite in Israel for a play about Begin, who is remembered as a strong leader who made peace with Egypt but who also ordered a military strike on Iraq's nuclear reactor.

Living in Israel for the last five years, Wiseman sensed "there's a feeling in the country that he's missed.

Gordie Wiseman meets Hasya Begin, the late Prime Minister's daughter, during a performance in the Knesset of Wiseman's play, Mr. Begin.

"I think there's a kind of lack of direction and leadership," he said on the phone from Israel. "Menachem Begin always had a clear vision where he wanted to lead Israel, and he was steeped in Jewish pride."

When U.S. president Ronald Reagan, advised by his vice-president George Bush and senior official James Baker, criticized Israel for the Iraq reactor bombing and held back a strategic arms agreement, "Begin said Israel had been around 3,700 years without a strategic arms agreement with America and would be around another 3,700 years. That's the kind of response we don't hear anymore, to stand up to a U.S. president," Wiseman said.

"We don't have to apologize all the time. We should be proud of what we have accomplished and that we're here to stay," said Wiseman, who worked as a lawyer in Canada and Israel.

So far, the play has been performed in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and in smaller centres. Audiences range in size from 120 to 400, with the largest to date in Ariel, which lies across the Green Line outside pre-1967 Israel.

So far, the mainstream media in Israel is pretty much ignoring the play. Their political slant coupled with the fact the play premiered in Jerusalem, not Tel Aviv, has kept them away, Wiseman believes.

"But 50 per cent of the population is excited to see a play about Begin, see the debate rekindled and see a different side of the debate," he said.

There's a lot to tell in the life and times of the former prime minister. Born in Poland, Begin possessed a distinctive old world charm, which would include kissing the hands of ladies. Though his political nemesis, David Ben-Gurion, would not even refer to him by name in the Knesset, Ben-Gurion's wife was charmed by him, Wiseman said.

The play tackles important issues from the time of Israel's founding, among them the 1948 Altalena incident, in which armed forces of the newly created State of Israel fired on the ship, which was carrying arms for the Irgun, he said.

As for Einstein's relationship with Begin, Wiseman believes "Begin and Einstein really reflected the story of the Jewish people in the 20th century.

"I find both these stories compelling, but its not like they were friends. They represented different sides of the Jewish experience in the 20th century."

Wiseman, a native of Winnipeg who lived in Toronto before making aliyah, said much of the history of the period has been "told through the eyes of Labor. So in the play, the other side comes out."

Mr. Begin was funded "on a shoestring," with the support of fellow Winnipegger Howard Rypp, who runs Nefesh Theatre. Nefesh Theatre will stage the show in South America in early 2015.

Original music for the play was composed by Wiseman's brother, Ron, who has also made aliyah. When living in Toronto, Ron was known as "king of Jewish reggae," Wiseman quipped.

Other brothers were similarly inclined to the arts. Older brother Howard is a professor of film at York University and a screenwriter while youngest brother Bob was a founding member of Blue Rodeo.

"We all got the bug," Wiseman said. "I call it a defective gene in the family." ■

Millennials: The future of Jewish non-profits

Young volunteers for Reuth Medical Center of Tel Aviv

MARLENE LITT
JNS.ORG

In 2007, a friend reached out to me for help. Her uncle was a long-term resident at the Reuth Medical Center in Tel Aviv, and she requested that I join her on the American Friends of Reuth's Young Leadership board to raise awareness for the facility. After visiting the medical centre, I quickly fell in love with Reuth, and I have been championing their young leadership programming ever since.

As a social worker, I've been exposed to many worthwhile non-profit organizations. From what I've seen, all of these organizations have three things in common: they work tirelessly to make a difference, they always need more money (to both maintain their ongoing activities and expand their reach), and they are most successful when volunteerism is strong within the organization.

Reflecting on the latter two items, it's clear to me that the key to non-profit success is engaging younger donors and volunteers. Gone are the days when an organization could survive on "old money" alone.

I would even take it one step further, to say that the very future of social services hinges on the involvement of "Generation Y," young men and women born between 1980 and 2000, also known as "millennials." It's not just because this generation will lead the voluntary sector one day. This is about more than pragmatism.

Millennials will soon wield more power than any previous generation, because they are the most passionate and idealistic generation to ever grace the planet. As such, when fuelled by values or a cause they believe in, they are virtually unstoppable. Therefore, engaging millennials is about much more than raising money. It's about convincing young, talented, and energetic individuals that your cause is their cause, too.

While young volunteers will snub the traditional fundraising appeals executed via direct mail and cold calls, they are always looking for inspiration. And once inspired, they are happy to give everything they've got to their new cause – their creativity, time, networking abilities, social media savvy and, at times, even their money. They take ownership and become emotionally invested very quickly.

You see, you can lead a millennial to water, but he will only "drink" if you allow him to follow through on his own terms.

Millennials usually turn to social networking tools like Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and blogs to spread the word about their favourite charities. They often raise funds for the causes they are passionate about by running marathons or similar events wherein they serve as the cheerleaders and others are encouraged to give. They throw parties that raise awareness and cold hard cash, but never stale fundraisers.

What drew me to Reuth was the fact the organization, which is now celebrating its 75th anniversary, has always been powered by idealistic young volunteers. From the very beginning, a group of young women saw a gap that needed filling and stepped up to answer that call. Many years later, our young leadership division keeps that flame of commitment, passion, and creativity burning.

For example, last Passover, we chaired a unique and successful fundraiser for a diverse international crowd. We arranged a "silent disco" on the roof of the Reuth Medical Center for more than 180 young adults from seven different countries. No patients were disturbed because party attendees listened to music on headphones, and all of the attendees genuinely enjoyed the experience and latched onto their new cause as they danced to the music. The key to our success was that the attendees were able to see the facility – the place where their money was going – first hand.

It is this type of creativity and out-of-the-box thinking that millennials can bring to the table. They know the type of events that would appeal to them and inspire them to give of themselves. Therefore, it only makes sense that they should be the ones organizing and running these events.

The formula is simple: after you convince the young, talented and energetic individuals that your cause is, in fact, their own, give them the keys and let them drive.

If non-profit organizations remain hesitant to hand over the reins to Gen Y, they may very well be jeopardizing their longevity. As such, we must do everything in our power to help Jewish charities appreciate the value of big hearts, huge talent, and long-term commitment over large, one-time endowments.

The future of Jewish philanthropy depends upon it. ■

Personalizing the Exodus from Egypt

REVEREND AMIEL BENDER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We read these words from our Haggadah at our seder table every year: "In every generation, it is one's duty to see himself as though he has personally gone out from Egypt." In the past, it has been difficult for me to conceptualize this thought.

Here we are sitting at a beautifully dressed seder table boasting the splendour of the holiday: special plates and silverware, fine food and wine, etc. Our families are dressed in their finest clothing, and I wear my kittel in true festive fashion. And still, we're advised by the Haggadah to see ourselves as if we participated in the Exodus from Egypt.

We are to imagine ourselves running away from a tyrant in the middle of the night with a sack of matzah and our few possesions, embarking on a journey to the Promised Land. Is there something wrong with this equation? How do we transform our personal psyche to becoming part of and understanding the Exodus that took place so long ago under different material and arguably spiritual circumstances?

I only began to understand this recently when I heard a stunning story from one of the teens in our community who participated in the annual March of the Living trip. The story goes like this:

The young woman, Rebecca Share, after completing the march from Auschwitz to Birkenau, was standing by the railroad tracks at Birkenau, where a ceremony was taking place. Over the loudspeakers, all of those present heard the names of precious martyrs of the Holocaust, continuously read over the period of a few hours.

All of a sudden Rebecca hears the name: Rivka Share. With chills running down her spine, she realizes that she has just heard her own name! She has the privilege of sharing her name with a martyr of the Holocaust! What an emotional, meaningful and deep moment!

While Rebecca realizes that she has just personalized her Holocaust remembrance experience in the most astonishing way, she also realizes that she, unlike Rivka Share, whose name she has just heard, is able to leave Birkenau and continue her life of freedom.

When Rebecca shared her story with me, I replied that I could finally understand the words of the Hagaddah, where we are told that in every generation we should see ourselves as if we were part of the Exodus from Egypt.

When Egypt becomes a part of us, we can share in and understand the experience and the meaning of this concept. By becoming part of this experience, we are also committing this experience to a memory that we are expected to carry with us for the rest of our lives. ■

Peace talks 'but not at any price,' says PM

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israel is ready to continue peace talks with the Palestinians, "but not at any price," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Sunday.

"To my regret as we reached the moment before agreeing on the continuation of the talks, the Palestinian leadership hastened to unilaterally request to accede to 14 international treaties. Thus the Palestinians substantially violated the understandings that were reached with American involvement [that neither side would take unilateral action]," Netanyahu said at the start of the regular weekly cabinet meeting.

His remarks came as the U.S. envoy to the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, Martin Indyk, was set to meet with the Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in an attempt to keep the peace talks going, at least until their April 29 scheduled end, and possibly beyond.

> Livni says Bennett trying to 'torpedo' peace process

The Palestinians "will achieve a state only by direct negotiations, not by empty statements and not by unilateral moves," Netanyahu said, adding: "Unilateral steps on their part will be met with unilateral steps on our part."

Israel's chief negotiator to the peace talks, Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, in an interview on Israel's Channel 2 on Saturday, accused Naftali Bennett's Jewish Home party of trying to "torpedo" the peace process.

As negotiations hit a major impasse last week, Housing Minister Uri Ariel of the Jewish Home party announced the reissuing of tenders for the construction of more than 700 residential units in the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo.

Livni also blamed Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for the failure of the talks.

Bennett responded to Livni's allegations on Sunday morning in a Facebook post: "Last night I heard that someone is blaming Bayit Yehudi (!) for the collapse of the negotiations with the Palestinians. She should remember what Rabbi Akiva said in Pirkei Avot: Silence is a sign of intelligence. Or as I would translate it into English: Silence is golden." ■

This Passover, help Israeli Scientists return to Israel

The University of Haifa's Returning Scientists Program, in partnership with the Israeli government, is designed to reverse the "brain drain" of Israel's academics and attract exceptional and talented expatriates. Today, close to 25% of Israeli scientists work abroad. There is no other country where a quarter of its scientists have left to work elsewhere.

We are committed to fostering outstanding research and strengthening Israel's northern region by attracting scientists who will make our university their home. In the last five years, more than 100 talented scientists, residing abroad, returned to Israel and chose the University of Haifa to continue their academic careers. By providing optimal conditions to advance research, including state-of-the-art laboratories with leading-edge equipment, our aim is to absorb another 100 returning scientists.

OPINION

Being the parents of an IDF soldier

Sagi Melamed

As I left synagogue Friday evening, my friend Itzik smiled at me. He has been giving me the same smile for the last 3-1/2 months, since my oldest son went into the IDF. It was the quizzical smile of a soldier's father, a smile that said: "How are you doing now that Guy's in the army?"

Guy recently ended basic training and started the next stage of the long, gruelling path that he chose and was chosen for. Some of the changes in Guy are external (broader shoulders, determined face, chronic exhaustion). Some he tells us, and some we can only guess. But what about the changes in us, his parents?

• All plans for weekends and holidays revolve around the question, "Will Guy be coming home?" When he does come home, we're all joyful (even his three siblings). When he doesn't, a faint air of longing pervades the house. With the army, there are no guarantees. Will Guy sit at the family seder table this year? We will only know for sure once we see him walk through the door.

• Indulgences. Like most new parents, we were stricter with Guy than with his younger siblings regarding table manners, meal times, restricting candies, giving chores and so on. Now, when he comes home on leave, all the rules of the family fall by the wayside. He's excused from washing dishes or cleaning up, and in general is totally indulged. He works hard enough in the army – at home he is pampered.

• Additional expenses. Sending a child to the army does not just rend the parental heart and cause insomnia. It also empties the parental pocket. In the first few months of Guy's service, we found ourselves spending hundreds – nay, thousands – of shekels every month on our soldier. From chocolate, cakes and the like, to sticky tape, creams, ointments, bandages, flashlights, knives, notepads, insoles, thermal tops, and other accessories to ease our minds a little with the thought that "at least we did the best we could" for the comfort of the boy who overnight became a soldier.

• Prayers. Whenever the Prayer for the Welfare of the IDF Soldiers was read on Shabbat and holidays, I would always focus my prayer on the welfare of "the soldiers" and "the IDF" who represent us all. Now that the prayer includes my own son, it has acquired a far more personal nature and additional kavanah (purpose).

• Whose boy is this? When Guy was in school, youth movement and yeshiva, the last word was always ours. Was he allowed to participate in the annual trip when he was a bit ill? Could he miss school? Was it OK for him to stay out late and drive home after midnight? But since he was drafted, the last word – and even the first word – has been the prerogative of the army. We parents are no longer the authority. That now rests with his commanders, soldiers older than him by maybe a year or two. "Commander X said…" "Commander Y punished me…" Now our boy belongs to his commanders.

A few weeks ago, I heard Guy talking on the phone to a friend who had also just been drafted and who was facing a crisis. "Do you remember how before the army we talked about Zionism, of the importance of contributing to the country and having a meaningful military service? Let's not forget all that, even when it's hard for us in basic training, when we don't understand the reasons for all the infuriating commands, when there seems to be an unbridgeable chasm between the Zionism of our youth movement and our current daily life. Let's remember why we're here!" Guy didn't know that I was listening to this conversation, or how his motivational speech to his friend bolstered his father's spirits. ■

TAU cancels lecture by convicted terrorist

Marissa Newman
THE TIMES OF ISRAEL, TEL AVIV

Amid mounting pressure from right-wing Knesset members and student unions, Tel Aviv University cancelled a scheduled lecture by convicted terrorist Mohammed Kanaane Sunday.

Kanaane was scheduled to speak at the university Monday to mark Land Day, which commemorates Arab protests against Israeli building policy.

The scheduled address drew protests outside the university Sunday and harsh condemnations from right-wing MKs.

"In light of concerns of disrupting the public order, and since the explicit request to have Mohammed Kanaane participate was only recently submitted without time for evaluation, the university does not approve his participation at the event," a statement released by the university read.

However, the statement maintained that other Land Day activities will proceed as planned.

Kanaane, an Arab-Israeli, served 4-1/2 years in prison over his involvement with Hezbollah and for receiving funds from Palestinian terror cells toward the production of weapons.

Kanaane was slated to speak at an event run by the Hadash and Balad student unions in commemoration of Land Day. ■

Israeli diplomats end strike

JTA
JERUSALEM

Employees of Israel's Foreign Ministry ended their two-week strike with an agreement to increase pay for diplomats.

In a statement, the Foreign Ministry Workers Union called the deal signed April 2 with the Finance Ministry an "outline" of a collective agreement that will be signed within a month, according to Israeli news reports.

Under the collective agreement, diplomats' salaries will be adjusted according to the cost of living in the country in which they are working. Also, there will be compensation for spouses of diplomats for loss of work in their field and the Foreign Ministry will help pay for the education of foreign diplomats' children.

"We are glad that the State of Israel understands the difficulties that the fighters of the Foreign Ministry must deal with and are sorry for the unnecessary damage that was caused," said a statement released April 2 by the Foreign Ministry Workers Union. "Tomorrow the foreign fighters of Israel will return to the global front line."

The open-ended strike shut down Israel's 103 embassies, consulates and diplomatic missions around the world, and caused the postponement or cancellation of visits by several world leaders and trips by Israeli officials. ■

Photographer spotlights mikvah in Ryerson exhibit

ILAN MESTER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Few people outside of the Jewish faith have learned about the mikvah. In fact, there are even people within the community who don't know much about this ancient ritual of purity. Canadian-American photographer Margalit Slovin is hoping to change that.

"Growing up, there were certain things that I knew about, but not necessarily in detail – the mikvah was one of them," she said. "I realized that if, as a Jewish woman, I knew very little of this ritual, there were probably many more people outside the Jewish faith who also had little knowledge."

The recent graduate of Ryerson's bachelor of fine arts in photography, is teaming up with the university to showcase her first solo exhibit, Mikvah: A Tradition of Purity. The exhibit, which runs through April 26 at Ryerson's I.M.A Gallery, was actually born out of Slovin's final-year thesis.

"It was definitely an interesting project to present to people," she said. "During critiques at university, I had to stress the modest nature of the subject matter."

Considering the ritual's intimate setting, Slovin admits she was pleasantly surprised that most of the subjects she approached were willing to participate in her project. "I think this was due in part to the fact that their identities are mostly hidden from the viewer," she said. "The photographs focus on their hair coverings, rather than their faces. I did this not only to show the modest nature of the women and the mikvah, but also to show the diversity of the women who partake in this ritual."

According to Slovin, she enjoyed the challenge of photographing her subjects without revealing their identities. "It actually wasn't difficult to photograph in this manner, on the contrary, I took it as a personal challenge to redefine portraiture."

The young photographer, who has interned at the Art Institute of Chicago, hopes her exhibit changes the way people view the mikvah. "When reading about the ritual, it often came across as archaic," she said. "I found a need to produce a body of work that presented the mikvah in a new light, putting it in a modern context."

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Thoughtful stage drama New Jerusalem opens to the book on Spinoza's philosophy

It's been more than 350 years since the freethinking Jewish rationalist philosopher Baruch Spinoza was excommunicated by the Jewish community of Amsterdam, an event that's the focus of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's current production, New Jerusalem: The Interrogation of Baruch de Spinoza at Talmud Torah Congregation, Amsterdam, July 27, 1656.

The play, written by David Ives and directed by Mitchell Cushman, opens with a 20-minute prologue in the theatre lobby, then moves inside the theatre, which represents the interior of Amsterdam's Talmud Torah Synagogue; patrons are offered yarmulkes and lace head coverings as they enter. The excellent cast includes Aris Athanasopolous and Alon Nashman, who are outstanding as Spinoza and the chief rabbi of Amsterdam, respectively.

Spinoza's metaphysical ideas were deemed so heretical and dangerous by both the Christian and Jewish communities that they colluded in stifling him. This highly intellectualized and riveting courtroom-style drama opens the book on Spinoza's philosophical ideas, which seem so innocent today, but which could only threaten the worldview of any society predating modern notions of freedom of religion.

New Jerusalem continues at the Studio Theatre, Toronto Centre for the Arts, through April 13. hgjewishtheatre.com

Names

There are notable Canadian connections to the film Labor Day, which recently opened in movie theatres. The film was directed by Jason Reitman, a second-generation film director and the son of director Ivan Reitman. It's based on the novel Labor Day by Joyce Maynard, a 60-year-old American novelist and nonfiction writer who is perhaps most famous for her relationship with reclusive literary legend J.D. Salinger when she was 18 years old.

An article Maynard had written for the New York Times Magazine caught Salinger's eye, and the two exchanged 25 letters, then lived together for 10 months in his home in rural New Hampshire in 1973. Maynard rarely discussed the relationship publicly until she wrote about it in her 1998 memoir At Home in the World.

Jose Feliciano performs at a benefit concert for the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind.

Maynard comes from a distinguished literary family. She was one of two daughters of Max and Fredelle (Bruser) Maynard. Her mother, the child of Russian-Jewish immigrants, wrote about her Saskatchewan upbringing in a bestselling memoir, Raisins and Almonds. She also penned a second memoir, The Tree of Life. Fredelle Maynard was a prolific writer of magazine articles for many top-notch publications, including Good Housekeeping, Ladies Home Journal and Chatelaine.

Joyce's sister, Rona Maynard, was a long-serving editor of Chatelaine. Rona and Joyce jointly produced another Maynard family memoir, My Mother's Daughter, which appeared in 2007.

A California resident, Joyce Maynard has had considerable success as a novelist. Labor Day is not the first of her books to be made into a film. Her 1992 novel To Die For also made it to the big screen. Her most recent novel, After Her, came out in 2013. She's the mother of three children, including American heartthrob actor Willson Bethel, who has had leading roles in the television soap opera The Young and The Restless and other series.

Inspirational short debuts at Nadal JCC

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Since winning the 2014 Oscar in February as best short documentary film, The Lady in Number Six: Music Saved My Life has been acclaimed in its premieres over the past few months in Montreal and Atlanta.

The 38-minute film, which chronicles the life of pianist Alice Herz-Sommer, who died at 110 in February as the world's oldest Holocaust survivor, will have its Toronto premiere April 13 at the Al Green Theatre, in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"Alice said before the cameras that music saved her life while being a concentration camp prisoner during the Holocaust. That alone would not have made the film memorable. What is memorable is Alice showing us how music is ingrained in her soul by playing Bach and Chopin with such passion and precision at age 109 and speaking eloquently on her past with an excellent memory of her achievements in life," said Frederick Bohbot, the Montreal-based filmmaker whose company, Bunbury Films, made and distributed the short.

Unlike many producers of Holocaust documentaries, Bohbot and director Malcolm Clarke wanted to create something more optimistic, and learned of Herz-Sommer through author Caroline Stoessinger's 2012 biography titled A Century of Wisdom.

"We did not want to do a story about hatred, pity or bitterness, but rather an optimist who would enlighten the audience about her life, and I'm grateful to Caroline for letting us know about Alice," Bohbot said.

"Truthfully, Alice lived a simple life in a London flat, not being materially rich, but rich with friends and an outlook that allowed Alice to not experience hatred even for the Nazis, despite her husband and mother being murdered by them."

Against a backdrop of vintage photographs from Herz-Sommer's 100 or so concerts at the Theresienstadt concentration camp, as well as photos from her early life at the turn of the 20th century, audiences hear Herz-Sommer's wisdom, which is reinforced through the comments of her two friends who also survived the Holocaust.

Herz-Sommer's positive comments in the film, such as "I don't hate. I even saw the good in the Nazis," may not be unanimously praised by audiences, but her honesty and positive attitude on how she survived is inspirational.

Her remark, "I was raised Jewish, but Beethoven is my religion," shows the power of music in her life.

Herz-Sommer was born in 1903 in Prague, where her parents ran a cultural salon, giving young Alice the opportunity to meet and know such towering artistic figures as Franz Kafka and Gustav Mahler.

She learned to play piano from pianist Artur Schnabel, and in the 1930s, she was getting recognition as a concert pianist, playing throughout Europe. She met and married violinist Leopold Sommer in 1931 and had a son Raphael, born in 1937.

When Czechoslovakia was invaded by the Nazis, Herz-Sommer did not flee to Palestine, as did most of her relatives. She cared for her ill mother, who eventually was murdered, as was her husband, in the Holocaust.

Because of her reputation as a concert pianist, Herz-Sommer was sent to Theresienstadt to serve as propaganda for the Nazis' claim that prisoners were well-treated there by having musicians like her play concerts in the camp. She was fortunate to be allowed to have her son stay there with her.

Following their liberation, she and Raphael emigrated to Israel in 1948. Raphael went on to become a concert cellist based in London, where Herz-Sommer immigrated in 1986. Raphael died of a heart attack in 2001.

"The bookings and popularity of the film with audiences continues to grow. The film will also be shown in Toronto in May, and I anticipate that many Jewish community centres and synagogues will book the film soon," Bohbot said.

The Lady in Number Six: Music Saved My Life will be shown four times on April 13 at the Al Green Theatre.

Both Bohbot and Clarke will host a question-and-answer session following each screening. Tickets are $10. For screening times and tickets, call 416-924-6211 or visit www.milesnadaljcc.ca. ■

North Carolina's Queen City takes off

MICHAEL STAVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

You can almost feel the heat rising off the racetrack as you sit in the driver's seat. The roar of the engine is deafening and the thrill of competition gets the adrenaline pumping while you wait for the green light. In a few moments, you'll be driving your stock car at speeds nearing 250 km/h along the Talladega Motor Speedway or the Daytona 500 racetrack.

No, this scenario isn't really happening, nor is it a dream sequence from a movie. You're experiencing the racing simulator at the NASCAR Hall of Fame in Charlotte, N.C. One of the most realistic simulators ever designed, it's just one of the many hands-on experiences at stock car racing's Hall of Fame.

Visitors to the Hall of Fame can "race" in qualifying tracks against other visitors, join simulated pit crews changing tires and filling gas tanks like the pros, or test their knowledge of racing history. Each visitor is given a unique access card and can select their favourite NASCAR driver to guide through the museum via numerous interactive computer displays.

The Hall of Fame guides visitors through several videos that detail the history of stock car racing and its North Carolina roots. Even non-racing fans will appreciate the dozens of championship stock cars on display, along with trophies, racing gear and apparel, as well as other NASCAR paraphernalia.

Charlotte, though, is home to more than just NASCAR. Nestled rustically near the hills of western North Carolina, Charlotte (nicknamed the Queen City), has in the last century transformed itself from a sleepy farming hamlet into one of the world's largest banking and financial centres. Home to Wells Fargo and Bank of America, Charlotte developed into the nation's second largest banking centre during the 1980s, following a series of mergers between banking powerhouses. Given its prominence within the financial world, the city was chosen as the site for last year's Democratic National Convention.

Like many other southern U.S. cities, the development of Charlotte was greatly impacted by circumstances surrounding the Civil War. Following the abolishment of slavery, many local farmers turned to commerce and established the city as a cotton and tobacco-processing centre. Several of the world's largest tobacco companies are headquartered in North Carolina. Although the industry is highly mechanized today, a number of 18th century tobacco plantations in the surrounding area have been preserved for tourists and offer daily tours.

State's history brought to life at Museum

Charlotte has much to offer families travelling to the region with children. In addition to the NASCAR Hall of Fame, the city is also home to the world famous Discovery Place science museum. Spread out over three floors and occupying a full city block downtown, Discovery Place's interactive exhibits and hands-on activities, as well as an aquarium and huge Omnimax theatre, make it a must-see for anyone visiting with children. Kids will also get a thrill out of the Charlotte Nature Museum, operated by Discovery Place. The museums are open seven days a week, and are certainly among the pre-eminent science centres in the southern United States.

The history of North Carolina is brought to life at the centrally located Levine Museum of the New South. Named for noted Jewish philanthropists and founders of the Family Dollar retail chain, Leon and Sandra Levine, the museum presents a comprehensive study of post-Civil War southern American society. Chronicling the reconstruction and rebuilding of the former Confederate states, the museum focuses on the development of North Carolina via numerous displays and exhibits. Visitors are treated to a timeline display of events in local history, from before the American Revolutionary War through Jim Crow segregationist laws as they were practised in North Carolina and up to the present-day "New South".

As detailed in a recent Levine Museum exhibit on the Jews of North Carolina, many of the city's Jewish men fought bravely for the Confederate army during the Civil War. Although maintaining a presence in the state since the early 19th century, the Jewish community began to flourish after the war. Using their expertise in trade and commerce, the Charlotte Jewish community, although small in number, had a tremendous impact on the dynamic economic growth the city has experienced in the last century.

Today, several synagogues service Charlotte's 12,000-strong Jewish residents. Although most of the city's Jews are non-practising, most maintain a strong Jewish identity. This sense of Jewish identity culminated in the construction of the city's 50-plus acre Shalom Park Jewish Community Center. Located in a tranquil park-like setting, Shalom Park is home to several synagogues, a massive recreation center and is the centre of Jewish life in Charlotte.

Whether as a stop on a trip further south, or as a destination on its own, take some time to visit this Queen City of North Carolina. ■

Michael Starsky acknowledges the assistance of the Charlotte Convention and Visitor's Bureau in arranging his family's trip to Charlotte.

Israeli writers recall a lost world

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For readers familiar with S.Y. Agnon's dazzling work, seeking an opportunity to re-experience the richly textured, ever-changing, kaleidoscopic literary immersion that is an Agnon story, or for those wishing to experience Agnon for the first time, there is cause for celebration. Agnon's The Parable and its Lesson: A Novella has just been published as part of the Stanford Studies in Jewish History and Culture.

The Parable and its Lesson has two narrators who relate events that happened in the shadow of the horrific Khmelnitsky pogroms of 1648. It features a descent by a rabbi and his shamash into Gehinnom (Hell) to help save a woman from becoming an agunah (a woman unable to re-marry).

This mysterious trip to Gehinnom, however, is only one point of departure in the story. Like so many of Agnon's works, The Parable and its Lesson takes the reader on an elaborate labyrinth journey. There are myriad detours: dissertations, discussions, homiletics, reflections and off-the-beaten-path side trips into a fantastical world of another time and place. We become entirely enveloped – some might say shrouded – as if in a giant, invisible tallit where the ancient is modern and the modern is an ordered jumble of tradition, fear, superstition, love, sacrifice, humility, haughtiness, cruelty and kindness. Agnon hides many of the nuggets of the story in this jumble and he does not make it easy for us to find them.

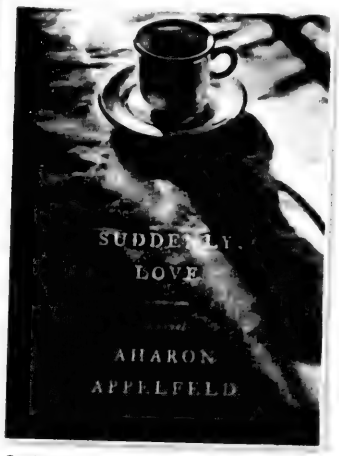
In 1966, ShmuelYosef (S.Y.) Agnon, along with the Jewish German poet Nelly Sachs, received the Nobel Prize for literature. He is the only Israeli writer, the only Hebrew-language writer, to have won that prize.

In bestowing the award upon the Andersson of the Swedish Academy made the following observation on Agnon's works: "In your writing, we meet once again the ancient unity between literature and science, as antiquity knew it. In one of your stories, you say that some will no doubt read it as they read fairy tales, others will read it for edification. Your great chronicle of the Jewish People's spirit and life has therefore a manifold message. For the historian, it is a precious source, for the philosopher an inspiration, for those who cannot live without literature it is a mine of never-failing riches... a combination of tradition and prophecy, of saga and wisdom." Andersson knew of what he spoke.

The Parable and its Lesson: A Novella
by S.Y. Agnon

Stanford University Press

Agnon died four years after receiving the award. But because of staunch Agnon enthusiasts and loyalists such as the late James S. Diamond, who translated The Parable and its Lesson, and Jewish Theological Seminary Prof. Alan Mintz, his work will live on. In the introduction to the book, Mintz described the story as "a truly exciting piece of literature that is unparalleled in the rest of modern Jewish writing." He also wrote an instructive essay about Agnon that makes the Stanford University publication particularly attractive.



Suddenly, Love
Aharon Appelfeld

Schocken Books

Aharon Appelfeld has not won a Nobel Prize for literature, although he is entirely worthy of the distinction. He is the recipient of many honours and awards for his work, but none yet from the Swedish Nobel Academy.

Appelfeld's volume of work is prodigious. He has written many works of fiction, non-fiction, poetry, literary criticism and other commentaries. That he writes in a language – Hebrew – that he acquired only after his arrival in Mandatory Palestine in 1946 at the age of 14, adds an additional measure of remarkability to the distinctive, penetrating quality of the stunning literature that flows from him.

Suddenly, Love (translated by Jeffrey M. Green) is Appelfeld's latest instalment in what he has described as the "long saga about the Jewish people, about what happened to them during the 20th century."

Suddenly, Love is the affecting, heart-rending story of Ernst, an ailing, 70-year-old, unflinching former Communist ideologue, a native of the Carpathian Mountain region of Bukovina (now in Ukraine) and veteran of the Red Army. Ernst, living all alone in Israel and haunted by recurring dreams and thoughts of his eventful past, is counting down the days of his tumultuous but ultimately wasted life. He is a writer who can no longer write. He cannot reach into himself to find the memories and emotions that his harsh experiences have seemingly buried into locked and impenetrably dark places in his soul.

Until he meets Irena.

Irena, a single 36-year-old who lives alone in the home of her deceased survivor parents, becomes Ernst's caregiver. Shy, self-effacing, self-doubting, yet thoughtful and tender, Irena is totally – even fiercely – dedicated to healing and protecting Ernst from the ravages of his mostly self-inflicted distress. Irena's daily, tireless ministrations to Ernst become the balm that soothes his wounds and "the key" that has opened "the heavy doors" of his heart.

Appelfeld is unrivalled in his ability to create an engaging narrative with spare, unembellished, economical writing. He is unique in building gravitas and literary momentum slowly, steadily, as if in slow march, through the use of short chapters and finely honed, almost clipped language. Indeed, in an interview with Eleanor Wachtel of CBC, Appelfeld explained his signature manner of writing as stemming from his experiences hiding from the Nazis where language could betray as well as redeem.

True to Appelfeld's long-perfected purpose, Suddenly, Love implores the reader, despite tears, to see with clarity and empathy the world that the author left behind.

Agnon and Appelfeld were born not very far from each other in what is now Ukraine – Agnon in Buczacz, Appelfeld in Czernovitz. Jewish life in their region was in some sense the epicentre of Jewish civilization in eastern Europe before World War II. That civilization, as we know, alas, was utterly destroyed.

Agnon and Appelfeld are the two pre-eminent Israeli authors whose works are devoted to memorializing that civilization. They do so with a near sacred emphasis on preserving individual and collective memories, and a constant reverence for the vanished people who reside there. ■

Photographer organized exhibit from Israel

She said, "within the exhibit, I have three sections of photographs: objects used for preparation; women with their head covered, and architectural interiors of the various spaces included in the mikvah building. Together, I have tried to explain the ritual as a process, rather than a singular person or space/room."

Aside from her unique photographs, what's impressive about Slovin's exhibit is that she organized most of it from overseas. The Texas-native moved to Israel to attend a seminary in 2013 – a week after she graduated from Ryerson. Within a month or so, she scored a full-time job at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

For one day each week, she worked as an image recourse and copyright associate. "It was amazing to be able to go through archives and see images being used all around the world," she said.

Slovin spent the rest of the week doing what she loves most: photographing. "This was great as I was able to use my skills as a photographer to capture other peoples' artworks," she said. "Some days I wouldn't know what I was photographing ahead of time, so it was a great surprise to see a work by an artist that I greatly admired waiting in the studio for me."

> Some days I wouldn't know what I was photographing ahead of time, so it was a great surprise to see a work by an artist that I greatly admired waiting in the studio for me.

Slovin has returned to Toronto for her exhibit and is happy she'll get to spend Passover with her family. However, she isn't staying in Canada for long. "I received a scholarship to go to France at the beginning of May for a couple weeks, learning with photography curators and conservators in Paris," she said. "I have never been to Europe and I'm very excited for this learning opportunity."

Following her stint in Paris, Slovin hopes to go back to school and obtain a master's degree. For now, though, she's focusing on her new exhibit. "As an alumna, I am even more thrilled to be having it at Ryerson's own Image Arts Student Gallery," she says. ■

Splitting the sea of chocolate in Israel

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One year when I was a kid, my bubbie brought over some chocolate bars for us. My mother was appalled because they weren't real chocolate at all, but some waxy, chocolate-flavoured thing with a token nod to cocoa way down in the ingredients list. "Why would she buy these," my mother wailed, "when there's so much good chocolate at this time of year?"

This year, celebrating our first Pesach in Israel, chocolate – simple, uncomplicated chocolate – is probably going to be one of the few things that are still easy.

Back in Toronto, a majority of Jews are Ashkenazi, and the Kashruth Council of Canada took care of everything for us. No flour, of course, but also no kitniyot: canola oil, rice, beans.

Here, we're no longer in the majority. Just about everyone here in Israel can eat all those yummies that we don't – corn, peas, even falafel, if you leave out the pita bread.

While they're feasting on falafel, corn-on-the-cob (or popcorn!), pea soup, and peanut-flavoured Bamba snacks, we'll be sifting through grocery-store shelves trying to find things we can take home and eat. True, everything is labelled – in Hebrew that needs a magnifying glass to decipher. Many packages have two hechshers (kosher symbols), one for during the year and one for Pesach. Which one's which? They don't teach you how to read product hechshers in our ulpan course.

I'm told it's gotten easier for Ashkenazim here. The hechshers are less baffling, better organized. And there's Facebook, where you can network for certain treasured ingredients, finding out which local stores carry what you need before you head out on a wild goose chase.

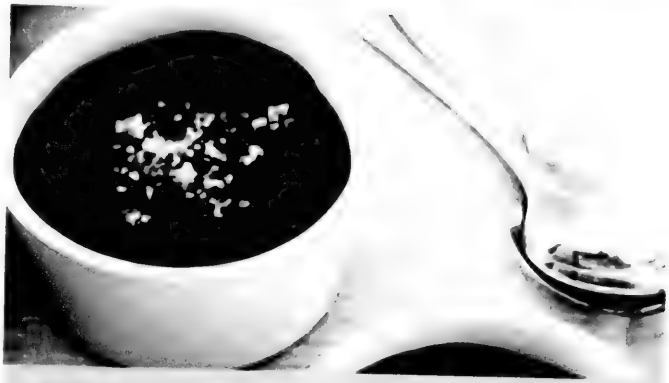
Things have also gotten more challenging in Toronto, with more kitniyot on the Pesach shelves every year. Not only for Sephardim, but also for Conservative Jews and others, who rely on rabbinic rulings that they're fine for Passover use.

Here in Israel, at Purim, I noticed a bag of chips proudly proclaiming it was kosher for Pesach and kitniyot-free. So there's one more thing we can eat. Chips – and chocolate. Since the very best chocolate has the fewest additives, particularly those troublesome kitniyot oils (like soy) that make up those waxy fake-chocolate bars, I can look forward to the best.

Kosher celebrity chef Jamie Geller feels the same way since making aliyah from the United States in 2012. Her new cookbook, Joy of Kosher: Fast, Fresh Family Recipes, which features over 100 fast and kosher recipes, includes many just for Pesach, especially her Olive Oil Dark Chocolate Mousse.

Turns out the chocolate's not masking anything. Both chocolate and olive oil play together deliciously in this recipe, with the olive oil providing a rich, silky texture, good-quality chocolate bringing its own distinctive flavour, and egg whites providing their heavenly fluff.

Is it safe to use raw egg whites? The Egg Farmers of Canada recommend proper food handling. Use only clean, uncracked eggs, wash hands before and after preparation, and keep this mousse well-chilled until serving. Very few salmonella cases have been traced to eggs in Canada, but seniors and those with weakened immune systems should avoid uncooked eggs and many other high-risk foods. Geller says that "you can use pasteurized eggs without affecting the results." ■



Olive oil dark chocolate mousse

JAMIE GELLER

From Joy of Kosher: Fast, Fresh Family Recipes

- ❑ 0 oz. high-quality (72 per cent cacao) bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped, or chocolate chips
- ❑ 8 large eggs, separated, at room temperature
- ❑ 3/4 cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1 tsp. instant coffee granules dissolved in 2 tbsp. boiling water
- ❑ grated zest of 1 small orange (optional)
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. kosher salt

Place the chocolate in a microwave-safe bowl and melt in a microwave, stirring after each 10-second increment, until smooth, about 1 1/2 minutes. Let cool slightly.

Place the egg yolks and 1/2 cup sugar in a medium bowl and whisk until pale yellow. Whisk in the olive oil, coffee, zest (if using), and salt until combined.

Add the melted chocolate and whisk until smooth.

Beat the egg whites in the bowl of a stand mixer or with a hand mixer until soft peaks form. Gradually sprinkle in the remaining 1/4 cup sugar and beat just until stiff peaks form. Add a generous spoonful of the egg white mixture to the chocolate mixture. Stir firmly until completely incorporated. Pour the chocolate mixture into the bowl of egg whites. Gently fold with a large spoon or rubber spatula until completely combined.

Divide the mousse into six 6-oz. ramekins and cover with plastic wrap. Refrigerate overnight.

Dress it up (Olive Oil Dark Chocolate Mousse Shots)

Serve the mousse with various toppings in individual shot glasses on a vintage silver tray. Top with whipped cream, orange zest curls, coarse flake sea salt, fresh berries, or crushed nuts. Geller recommends Salted Nut Powder "for something really special." Pulse 3 tbsp. shelled pistachios and 1 tsp. coarse sea salt by hand or in a mini food processor or coffee grinder until ground and slightly powdery but still with some rough chunks. Sprinkle on top of mousse before serving. (Serves 6)

Music once with us is always there

Michael Gordon

There has been a lot written about music recently, especially with the focus on its benefits for mood, behaviour and social interaction in people living with dementia.

The Music and Memory iPod project supported by the Alzheimer Society of Toronto and the release of the documentary that followed the short YouTube clip of Henry-Alive Inside have assisted those who support and promote music as an intervention that can help individuals living with dementia to connect to the music they loved in the past, and enable them to still do so given the right stimulus.

There are many studies from the neurosciences, neuropsychology and neuro-imaging (such as with what is called a functional MRI) that support the premise that music affects brain pathways that release chemicals responsible for the experience of pleasure, as well as promoting a calming, soothing or pleasurable albeit exciting effect.

With this background, I can relate one of those wonderful experiences that individuals who attend live concerts often experience when it all seems to "come together" in an exhilarating musical and emotional live musical experience.

I recently unexpectedly attended a concert alone at the Toronto Symphony. I was excited to know that Angel Hewitt, one of Canada's foremost concert pianists, was to perform Beethoven's 5th piano concerto, and the Finnish conductor Hannu Lintu was also to conduct Sibelius' 5th symphony. I looked forward to both performances because of the associations each had in my own musical history.

At the age of 14, when I was an eager classical music fan and still taking piano lessons, I received a 33-1/3 rpm record gift from one of my special aunts. That was the state of the art of music recording in those days: the 45 rpm had already existed for many years, but the 33-1/3 rpm with stereo and other enhancements was considered the hallmark of recording power. With even a modestly priced amplifier, turntable and speakers, the sound was quite remarkable.

My components were separately chosen and bought using money saved from babysitting and other odd jobs, and I was very proud of it. I often spent hours on Saturdays roaming the section of Manhattan that had equipment outlets and marvellous record stores within a few square blocks. My favourite was the iconic Record Hunter, which unfortunately closed its doors in 1992, having opened in 1945 – just after World War II. I was always attracted to the bargain bins, where, even if it took an hour of searching, I would find a very credible performance of a piece I loved, at a price that was within my very limited music budget.

My aunt's present was a new release of Beethoven's 5th piano concert performed by the renowned French pianist Robert Casadesus, which was released in 1955 with Dimitri Mitropolous conducting and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra performing. I was 14 years old. I was so thrilled that I literally listened to it over and over again until it became embedded in my musical memory and what I call my musical soul. It is that musical soul that I believe the personal music program evokes in those living with even late-stage dementia, and this is why it is so powerful.

The monument for Sibelius in Helsinki

The Sibelius symphony aroused my recollections of a visit to Finland as a medical student, where I was hosted by a fellow Finnish medical student I had met on an exchange program to Warsaw, Poland. My visit to his home included a weekend at his cottage at a remote lake, a real sauna experience including the leap from the heated sauna into the icy-cold, small nearby lake, and the thrashing of each other with leafed branches. The haunting beauty of Finland exudes from Sibelius' 5th Symphony, and the conductor's joyous and ever light-footed movements despite its considerable height, made for another spectacular associative musical experience for me.

Music, once with us, is always there. We must not forget it and should include it as part of our lives during every stage and every condition – for many of us, it provides a connection to a world of beauty and internal sensuality. ■

Yacov Fruchter examines Aaron's reaction to the death of his two sons
Rabbi Shalom Spira says respect for nature and the Torah is our joint clarion call Rachael Turkienicz offers a formula for the multiple stages of healing

Yacov Fruchter

After the sudden, traumatic deaths of Aaron's two sons, Nadav and Avihu, Moses is commanded to share with his people the laws pertaining to boundaries, including sexual and ritual. This parshah is traditionally read two weeks after Shmini, the portion in which the deaths are originally recounted. What's the connection with the laws taught in this week's parshah?

I've always been unsatisfied by the rabbis' interpretation of Aaron's response to the death of his sons – "Vayidom Aharon." Aaron was silent. Rashi praises his silence and says he was rewarded for accepting God's will. I find this reading unfathomable, sterile and devoid of humanity.

In contrast, the Ramban says Aaron initially let out a loud public sob. Then, after hearing Moses' comforting words, he became silent. We each respond to tragedy in our own way, but I want to believe that Aaron, spiritual leader of his generation, first high priest and a father, would react with raw, unbridled emotion. However, after taking time to grieve, Aaron and the community need to move on. The only way is to establish laws and rituals that ensure others don't suffer the same fate as Nadav and Avihu, who crossed an unspecified boundary and died.

During the Pesach seder, when we recount the 10 plagues, we spill a drop of wine for each to teach that even though the Egyptians enslaved us, we recall the suffering of those who were also created in God's image. In contrast, when the Israelites saw their captors dead on the seashore, they responded with singing and music. Could anyone blame them? Today, we can't help but feel a little sorry for the Egyptians.

May we all be honest enough to let our true emotions show, and when the moment passes, find the power to create rather than destroy. Such true freedom is worth celebrating. ■

Yacov Fruchter is spiritual leader of Toronto's Annex Shul.

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"And any person from the children of Israel and from the convert who dwells among them who will hunt wild animals or birds that are eaten – and he shall spill its blood and cover it with dust" (Leviticus 17:3). This verse teaches us two types of respect.

First, from the "hunt" reference, the Talmud (Chulin 84a) derives the etiquette that one is advised to limit his consumption of meat to special occasions (e.g., the Sabbath and festivals), just as one only periodically embarks on hunting adventures. Rashi explains that the purpose of this advisory is to avoid poverty. Rabbi J. David Bleich (Tradition 46:4) suggests that the poverty in question actually reflects the ecological cost of raising surplus livestock. If so, the Torah is encouraging us to respect the natural environment.

Second, from the "spill its blood" reference, the Talmud (Shabbat 22a) infers that just as the slaughtering is orchestrated by hand, so, too, must the covering of the blood. It would certainly be more thermodynamically convenient for the slaughterer to cover the blood by kicking dirt with his or her feet. Nevertheless, the slaughterer is required to invest effort to cover the blood by hand, so that he or she will not insult the mitzvah. From this we learn an umbrella principle to respect every mitzvah. [See Encyclopedia Talmudit, under bizui mitzvah, for a list of applications.]

Indeed, these dual respects appear to be reflected in the Rambam's exposition of how to fulfil the commandment of ahavat HaShem, love of God. In Hilchot Yesodei HaTorah 2:2, the Rambam rules that one loves the Creator by studying nature. In Sefer Hamitzvot, the Rambam directs that one loves the Giver of the Torah by studying His mitzvot. Respect for nature and respect for mitzvot is our joint clarion call. ■

Rabbi Spira is a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre in Montreal.

Rachael Turkienicz

This week's Torah portion, Acharei Mot (After the Death), discusses what happens after the sudden and tragic death of two of Aaron's sons. There seems to be no instruction on how Aaron is to recover, but the Torah immediately proceeds to business as usual.

Yet the name of the portion is the most striking of all the information, because it speaks to the dilemma when we lose someone we love. Is there a world for us after a death? How do we function when everything is different?

Interestingly, the Torah seems to be saying it's business as usual, but within the sequence of Torah readings lies a formula for healing.

The first reading presents Aaron's role in the technical ritual for Yom Kippur. The second and third readings follow with details of sacrificial ritual. It's all very dry and technical, but that's the starting point of healing. We re-enter our lives through the dry and the technical. There's no search for meaning, because there's no meaning to be had. We head for the routine, the step-by-step automatic sequence of our day.

The fourth reading speaks of the Holiness Code. It's one of the most spiritually elevating portions of the Torah, explaining how we can elevate the mundane to the holy. In other words, after a death, we regain our footing through the technical, but the next step is to elevate our routine to the spiritual and ultimately to the holy. Step two of healing after a death is to begin to feel again.

The Torah then discusses the prohibition against eating blood, because it's the life force of the animal. The symbol of combining the physical with the spiritual is step three after a death.

Finally, the Torah concludes by defining limitations of intimate relationships. The last step of healing is to re-enter our relationships with others.

Acharei Mot seems dry at first, technical and unfeeling, but the message of healing within speaks universally to us all. ■

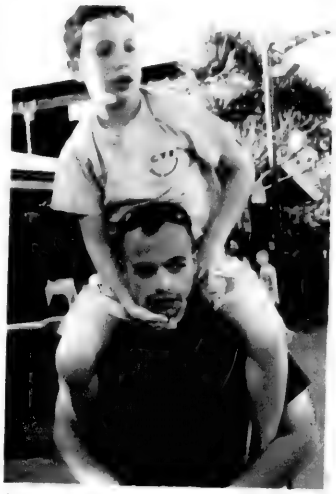
Ari Mandel: Leaving ultra-Orthodoxy is possible

CARA STERN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ari Mandel was raised in an ultra-Orthodox chassidic community in Monsey, N.Y. He married at 18 and had his first child a year later. When he was 22, he became an atheist. Now, he's a student at New York University, and he works with the It Gets Besser project to teach like-minded individuals that you can live a happy, fulfilling life outside of the community. His message: it may seem difficult – even impossible – but it is possible to leave that lifestyle, and after people make the break, it gets better.



Ari Mandel and his son Jake

What is It Gets Besser?

It's a play on the Dan Savage project called It Gets Better for gay kids and teens who are bullied and are going through a rough time. He got people to record a video saying, "It gets better, don't give up."
Our idea was to do essentially the same thing for people who have left the ultra-Orthodox community to live life as they see fit outside of that world.

For many of us, it's a very rough transition, so it was essentially the same message: it is hard but it's not the end of the world. We've all been through it, and you can do it. It gets better. The Yiddish word for "better" is besser.

Since the project started a few years ago, our video got 50,000 or 60,000 hits. Since then, we made a website where we host individual videos of people talking for a few minutes. Recently we did this third iteration, which is longer, and the new idea was people going about their current everyday lives, but at the same time, listening to music that is literally from their past or reminiscent of it, and still connects them to that world.

In my case, I was studying and in the background, I'm playing music that comes from the ultra-Orthodox world. It shows everybody going about their day and doing their thing.

You can leave that world but you don't have to abandon everything. You can take the things you find enjoyable and meaningful and cobble together a happy existence.

How would you describe life as an ultra-Orthodox Jew?

In my case, as ultra-Orthodox lives go, I had a very normal life. I believed in everything they stood for. I agreed with it and I was fine with that life.

The problems arose when I started to find holes in the veneer. The more research I did to plug up those holes, the bigger those holes got. I came to realize that it wasn't quite as cut and dry as they had led me to believe. Ultimately, I decided to leave.

> Try getting a job even at McDonald's when you don't have a high school diploma and can't do basic arithmetic.

Growing up in that world, you don't go to libraries, you don't read books other than what they approve of, written for and by them.

What made you decide to leave that life behind?

I got married at 18, which is normal in that world. Once you're married, you have a little more freedom and autonomy, so I could go to the local public library for the first time. I was just reading for the fun of it. I wasn't looking for trouble, I wasn't looking for anything in particular, but just reading material that wasn't so heavily censored, introduced me to ideas I never knew about before. I just kept following the leads, and it completely shattered my worldview.

By the time I was 24, I had been trying for a couple of years to reconcile what I was thinking and what I was doing. Eventually, I couldn't do it anymore. At 24 I left.

I ended up joining the U.S. Army, did that for five years, and got out at the end of 2011.

Now, I'm not religious by any standard. I'm culturally Jewish. I'm more than happy with that. That's exactly who I am. But what Jewish used to mean to me and what it means now are very different things.

Growing up in that world, it's all encompassing. It's your entire world. It's all your friends, everything you know and everything you've ever read. You're Jewish first, human second and American third. Now, I'm human first, American second and I happen to be Jewish, so I appreciate the cultural things that come with that, but it no longer defines every moment of my life or every drop of who I am and of my day.

How prevalent is that idea that people who leave ultra-Orthodox Judaism can't have happy and healthy lives?

Within the community, that is the predominant view. You're either here with us and your life is perfect and happy, or you leave and you're miserable and end up as a drug addict in an alleyway somewhere. That is the prevailing view.

How difficult is it for people to leave Orthodox Judaism?

It's very difficult. Everyone has their own story and their own past. It's harder for some people than it is for others, but across the board, it's difficult.

I happen to be able to speak English, but there are many of my peers who sound like they just got off the plane or boat from eastern Europe. We have virtually no secular education. Try getting a job even at McDonald's when you don't have a high school diploma and can't do basic arithmetic.

There's family pressure, community pressure, there's all sorts of scare tactics that they employ against us.

What was the biggest challenge in leaving the community?

It was definitely the emotional stuff, not wanting to hurt my family and friends, not wanting to disappoint my parents. The emotional boundaries were the hardest.

What is your relationship like with your family these days?

It was difficult at first, but we now get along wonderfully, almost as if nothing ever happened. We play a game of don't ask don't tell. They know I don't live their lifestyle anymore, but I'm respectful enough.

Regarding my wife, what happened was, we didn't end up staying married, but she did end up following me out of the community. We get along as friends, so we're not fighting each other.

I don't have many of the issues many of my peers have.

What advice would you give to people whose families don't accept their decision to leave?

It's really tough. There are court battles, child custody battles. It gets dragged on forever, and it gets really ugly. The community will gang up against the person leaving. It's not pretty, and it's not easy. I do not envy those people. I'm very involved in these issues as an activist, so I'm aware of it happening.

Mostly, "It Gets Besser" shows that others have done it and the world didn't come to an end and they're living happy and normal lives. That's the biggest message we want to point out with the video, but aside from that, yes, there is a growing community of people who have left, whether it's online or real life. It's a growing community, with organization and get-togethers and everything you can think of, with all sorts of people. That has made it easier to leave.

What's the most important thing ultra-Orthodox Jews should know about those who choose to leave?

All of those stereotypes they like to say about us are just not true. We're just like you.

It's not about sex drugs and rock 'n' roll. If you would just play nice instead of fighting us, we wouldn't be fighting back. It wouldn't be a standoff. We would have a lot more to gain from each other if we played nice, if we stopped fighting.

They often complain we badmouth them or make them look bad, but for the most part, all we're doing is saying we don't like that lifestyle and are leaving it

If we could all stop fighting each other, things would be better for everyone.

Our slogan is, "We're not saying you should. We're not saying you would. We're saying you could."

People ask me, 'Should I leave?' I'm not saying you should leave. I'm not saying it's the default right answer, but just know it's a possibility, that it's doable.

If you want to badly enough, you can do it. It's not the end of the world

Thousands of others have done it, and we're a living testament to the fact that you can do it and be happy. ■

A lesson from Maimonides

Backstory

RABBI YIRMIYA MILEVSKY

Jewish people living under oppressive rule have always been part of the Diaspora experience, and at times, the religion practised by the emperor, czar or sultan was forced upon the Jews.

One such incident occurred in the 12th century. At that time, the Almohad caliphate, an Islamic Berber dynasty from Morocco, controlled North Africa, and presented the Jews (and other non-Muslims) with a choice – conversion to Islam or death.

Numerous Jews refused to convert to Islam and were killed by the Almohads. Others, wishing to save their lives, proclaimed a belief in the Prophet Muhammad. Yet privately, they carried on with Jewish traditions. Thus, they worshipped in mosques but secretly recited their own prayers. These crypto-Jews lived with fear on the outside and guilt (part of the tradition perhaps) within.

Around 1160, a rabbinic judicial opinion was circulated, claiming that: "Whoever attests the mission of Muhammad thereby renounces the Lord God of Israel. One should rather be killed than profess." The author claimed that observing Jewish law secretly, while acknowledging Islam externally, is futile. If the law is not followed publicly, it is worthless! He added that turning to God in prayer after proclaiming belief in Muhammad, is in itself a sinful act.

A young scholar in the city of Fez, Morocco, named Moshe, recognized the danger in this widely circulating responsum. He was quite concerned about the unnecessary martyrdom and superfluous shame and guilt that would be caused by the mistaken author of the rabbinic opinion. So the young Moshe went on the offensive, and wrote his own epistle.

Moshe's Epistle on Forced Conversion was written in Arabic, the language used by the masses, yet today we only have a Hebrew translation of the letter. Scholars believe that the original may be lost because Jews tried to conceal it from Muslim officials.

Several significant points are made by the author of the epistle. Among them, he condoned conversion to Islam for the sake of saving lives, discouraged martyrdom and recommended migration, despite the danger of the journey.

Moshe noted that the author of the circulating responsum failed to differentiate between accepting Islam voluntarily and doing so only under compulsion. "Even ones who worship idols, if done under coercion, are not barred from the world to come," he noted. Moshe used harsh words ("even brainless people would not say such things") toward the author who failed to make a distinction between acts done willingly and acts done under constraint.

The author of the rabbinic opinion's claim that the prayer of a crypto-Jew is meaningless and even a misdeed, was sharply criticized by Moshe. He proved from numerous rabbinic sources that even the prayers of an actual sinner are treasured by God. "How much more so regarding individuals who are only making statements due to duress?" he noted.

Moshe added that throughout the biblical narrative, individuals, even great ones like Moses, Isaiah and Elijah, who were critical of the People of Israel were rebuked or punished by God. Thus, Moshe wrote: "How can the author of the response allow his tongue to talk negatively on the community of Israel and call them sinners and evil doers and heretics? One can only wonder how great will be his punishment for castigating those who made choices to avoid the sword." Moshe added that despite their public proclamations, the people are not sinners and God has not abandoned them.

The value of Klal Yisrael, the People of Israel, is the essence of this paragraph, and perhaps of the whole letter. The young author, who grew up in a home of scholarship and leadership, understood the value of the Children of Israel. When one values the nation, the message and spirit of every conversation or written communication will carry a different tone.

This message is quite as relevant today as it was centuries ago. Any issue that relates to the Jewish People, Torah or the State of Israel will generate a wide range of viewpoints, opinions and philosophical perspective. What is crucial for the welfare and unity of our nation, is to appreciate the value of the Nation of Israel. If we adopt the outlook of the young Moshe of Fez – known to all of us today as Moshe ben Maimon, Maimonides – respect and tolerance will come naturally.

The sad reality is that when our enemies fire rockets at us from Gaza or Lebanon, they do not differentiate between secular and religious, Sephardi and Ashkenazi. To them a Jew is a Jew. Perhaps it is time we take the same approach toward ourselves. ■

Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky is the spiritual leader of Congregation B'nai Torah in Toronto.

On March 22, 2014, Robert "Bob" Gottlieb ז"ל (78) passed away, beloved husband of Judith, father to Michael and step son Yoav Rappaport; also grandchildren, in Scottsdale, AZ. Bob worked as the public relations director at UJA from 1981-1990, where he led major fundraising campaigns to benefit his beloved Israel (where he lived for 4 years and met his wife) and the Toronto Jewish community. Bob brought his Hollywood sitcom writer experience and creativity to the position. Bob enjoyed spending time with his dog, Jamie, reading books and the CJN, and listening to NPR.

Essay

The People of the Books

PAUL SOCKEN

Jews are known as the People of the Book but we are also the People of the Books. Jews are incurable readers and writers, perhaps because books are portable creations for a portable people.

I devoted my professional life to teaching and writing about literature and, just before retirement, began a project that became a book, The Edge of the Precipice: Why Read Literature in the Digital Age, published last September by McGill-Queen's University Press.

Shortly before my retirement, I asked my students how many of them read a newspaper in print or online: hardly any. I asked how many of them read literary texts, such as novels, poetry or short stories: very few. I asked how many read history or any other non-fiction: again, few.

It became increasingly apparent that some fundamental change was taking place. Perhaps the change to a much vaunted visual society, a return to an oral culture supplemented by images on a screen, was well underway, as Marshall McLuhan had foreseen.

> There is no Jewish society without literature, whether sacred or secular

In The Edge of the Precipice, I wanted to start a discussion about the role of literature in a society which is clearly concerned about jobs and advocating for immediate, concrete, results-oriented education. My conviction throughout my career was that I was providing my students, by teaching them language and literature, important tools to assist them as educated citizens and which would be ultimately useful to them in whatever work they undertook.

If literature is about concentrating the mind, plumbing the depths and the search for meaning, it is not surprising that Jews have been engaged in the enterprise from "the beginning". Torah is as much narrative as it is law.

The same rabbis who discuss law in the Talmud, recount elaborate and sophisticated stories that explore the laws under discussion and help yield their meaning, importance and application. Midrash is a gloss on the Jewish tradition that "fills in the gaps" of Torah in an imaginative and highly literary format while maintaining the sacred nature of the text.

There is no Jewish society without literature, whether sacred or secular. Europe had Sholem Aleichem and many other Yiddish and Hebrew writers to "tell our story", to paraphrase Hamlet. American Jewish writers are legendary and constitute an integral part of the American literary landscape. Canadian Mordechai Richler is as well known as any writer in our country. And Israel's literary scene is as vibrant as the country that gives birth to it.

As Sven Birkerts, one of the authors in my collection, writes, "the purpose of literature is less to communicate themes or major recognitions and more to engage the mind, the sensibility, in a process that... bears upon our living as an ignition toward inwardness, which has no larger end, which is the end in itself. Enhancement. Deepening. Priming the engines of conjecture."

Jews are, indeed, the People of the Book and the People of the Books. In the struggle to remain fully human in a robotic world of technology and practical materialism, I hope Jews will be leaders, not just of a Start Up Nation, but as thinkers, writers, communicators of a vision of a Brave Old World, one of values, depth and meaning. ■

The Jewish Side of the Poem

I.B. ISKOV

Like a love song, unfurled and loose
I am surprised by the wide frame of words uncontrollably happy.

The composition is gathered like freshly cut flowers;
a bouquet too pretty admired only a short time bewitching before wilting.

I press dried phrases of pink and beige between the stanzas to make the poem flat:
punctuation must be clean and germane.

I clip solitary thoughts,
pinch thorns without fragrance.
Sometimes the words tumble, mock their own arrangement and mouth the vase.

It's a human-interest thing.
In the rush of the poem,
I pluck the burgeoning words, arrange brittle petals in pots, display my Jewish side.

Schav

I.B. ISKOV

I smell schav from thoughts, ramble in that other language without reason.
I imagine words
naked in their truths.

My shadow drags my whispers with high authority.
A lot of chutzpah
fades a little each day.

Bent by a notion,
I'm lying on my back as light falls across the bed like a tallis.
I scrutinize the sanctity of the spread.

The moment jumps to life, where a lump of schav disappears into my mouth like the thoughts of a silent chorus.

The Tarnogrod Jewish Cemetery

PEARL ADLER SABAN

I've not been there. Yet.

But therein lie the Jewish townsfolk who were graced with graves.

The ones who were buried with a proper Kaddish, when mourners gathered to pray. And cry. And throw earth atop the plain wooden boxes. And visit. Always visit.

And the headstones – black or grey – with their ancient Hebrew letters remembering the adult. Or the child.

And embedded symbols: A pair of candlesticks. A lamb. A tree trunk. Outstretched hands and fingers of a Kohen. A pitcher for a Levite to pour.

The circle of life ended here for many…

Years went by. Headstones toppled, destroyed by nature and by man. Stolen to use as blocks for building roadways and pathways. And a stable floor. The cemetery became a cemetery. Nobody remained. Identities were lost. People forgotten.

Until a survivor understood that to rebuild a cemetery was a way to sanctify life. And death.

And a wall of remaining headstones – mainly fragments of headstones – was created. Floating Hebrew letters set in cement. Half a name here. Or a Hebrew birth date there. A snatch of a pasuk here, an embedded symbol there. Kaddish was recited. Lives were recognized…and remembered.

And the cemetery was visited. Again. And again. ■

Dedicated to the Jews of Tarnogrod, Poland, including members of my family – the Adlers – who lived, loved and perished in Tarnogrod, and to Joseph Schorer, z"l, my late father's friend and "landsman" who made great efforts to bring the Tarnogrod Jewish Cemetery "back to life."

A people once were we
Our heads were made of clay
When the Lord said listen
We turned the other way.
Still the Ten Commandments
Were handed down to us
Then we could have heeded
We should have made a fuss.

So we were made to wander
Across the many seas
A stranger 'midst the nations
Unanswered went our pleas
Now we return once again
And thousands of years have gone by Back to the ancient land of our fathers thousands died here on this cursed piece of heartless earth: a Jew every 45 minutes turned to smoke – the SS boasted of it – 45 minutes train to gas chamber/train to cinder; 12,000 a day, hundreds of thousands, millions in all, from whips to ashes... no one left alive here. later, only empty trains departed... everyone knew, the world knew, and no one cared...

no one cares now....

thousands died here, as they bled and burned and yearned for mercy; blood mopped up with scarlet-tarnished shovels scooping globs of clots into the fresh-dug hollows by tainted spades that witnessed raw flesh oozing rusty-crimson on aborted grounds; voiceless shadows straddling on the pulse of hate; rows and rows of names on endless lists; the wasted with numbers etched on wasting arms; starved, raped, bullet-riddled to the wall; cursed, confused, used, abused, till sweat and tears and blood beaded down their emaciated see-through cheeks;

hunched over, squatting low or leaning into barbed wire, fire-charged current seeking flesh to sear, they prayed;
oh how they prayed; asked their ancient God what to do; what it was that they had done – in the same voice
they used to praise Him;

but the total silence screamed back a hollowness; a response of broken vows; and all they saw was bright-red pigment on a blackened earth, and teeth and hair and bones melted into ash;

and they took their place in line....

Ghosts

KENNETH SHERMAN

Poland is overrun with the ghosts of murdered Jews.

They are in the churches hovering above thin white candles.
They are in the homes, in the steam rising from barley soup.

Their faces look out from the fireplaces lovers sit before, from the clear lakes and rivers men fish in.

In the city of Warsaw their disembodied voices still bicker in the markets laugh in old theatres.

What is the life expectancy of a ghost?

In Spain, where the ghosts are 500 years old their faces are less definable their screams fainter and by the ruins of the Second Temple they are simply light upon stone.

The Yellow Flower

MUGUETTE MYERS

It was a beautiful spring in France that year.

Maman when she went shopping, always brought home flowers for our table. I loved flowers.

That day she brought back a yellow flower with a black heart. To my 5-year-old eyes, it was the most beautiful that Maman ever brought home.

She gave it to me and told me to have it with me always. In order for me not to lose it, she sewed it on my coat. I was very proud and I pitied the other girls in my class who did not have one.

When I was walking in the streets I sometimes saw some young men looking at me and sneering. I figured out the reason they did so: They were jealous of my beautiful flower!

Then, one day, Maman told me that I could not have the beautiful flower any longer and she took it off my coat.

That happened many years ago.

Today my yellow flower rests in my Bible. It has the shape of a 6-pointed star – the Star of David – with the word: JUIF (Jew), stamped in its heart. ■

Mezuzah For Mama

AVIVA RAVEL

When Elsie moved into her new flat she removed the mezuzah from the doorpost of the front door. The ancient case had broken into shards as she dislodged the nails and pried loose the metal container. A piece of parchment containing Hebrew script fell out of the case; brittle and yellow with age it crumpled in her hand. She gathered the fragments of metal and parchment, stored them in a paper bag, and placed it in her sewing basket which contained a myriad of odds and ends such as balls of wool, knitting needles, and threads of many colours. Then she set about cleaning her new kitchen.

Shel nodded in approval at the empty space that had been occupied by the mezuzah. He had had a hard day at the knitting mill and looked forward to his hot cup of tea. "So you did it," her husband said, stirred sugar into his cup, and turned to the editorial pages of the evening newspaper.

"I said I would," came the reply.

"What will your mother say?"

"It's my home. She won't say anything."

Elsie was right. When Mrs. Klein visited her daughter's new home, holding in her arms toys for her 4- year-old granddaughter, a new tablecloth, and dishtowels, she noticed immediately the blank oblong space once occupied by the mezuzah. To prevent herself from commenting, she bit hard on her lip, then summoned Lori to receive her Chanukah presents: a red-haired doll that came with a pretty dress and miniature dishes. "Thank you, Bubbie, thank you," the little girl squealed.

Two years before, Mrs. Klein's daughter and son-in-law had joined the Party. She bit on her lip then too. She knew what this entailed: her daughter would refrain from lighting Shabbos candles, neither would she light candles on the Chanukah menorah, and attending shul was out of the question. Although Mrs. Klein had raised her daughter in an observant home she now feared that the rituals she had so carefully maintained, would be lost on the next generation.

Elsie noticed the pained look on her mother's face and declared fervently, "We are against religion. Religion is the opiate of the people. We are atheists. We don't believe in myths and miracles. You have to understand that."

Of course Mrs. Klein understood. She was up-to-date on current events since a day didn't go by without her having read Der Tog as well as the daily English Star from cover to cover. "Has everyone in your organization renounced their religion?" she asked in Yiddish.

"Yes, of course. None of my gentile comrades go to church."

"But you're having a Christmas party in a few weeks. I see the notice on the refrigerator."

"Christmas is a national holiday. It's not religious. Everyone has a party."

Although Mama was deeply wounded, she brushed a grey strand of hair away and maintained a stubborn silence. She was generally not a cheerful person. She had experienced hunger, war, loss of family and friends, while a bout with typhus in Romania left her frail for the rest of her life. However, she never grumbled and attended to her household duties with the diligence and care associated with devoted Jewish mothers.

"Look Mama, I know you don't agree with the principles of the Party. But what we want is equality for all people, no matter their race, colour, and nationality. Justice for all. One day we'll have one beautiful world, no separate countries, no borders, no racism. Religion and nationalism separate people."

Mezuzah For Mama

"The Hindus will also be part of the new world?"

"Sure, why not?"

"So what are they going to do with all their temples?" Mama's attempt at a joke was lost on Elsie.

"Ma, you're missing the point."

"I know. I'm old fashioned. But, my daughter, I love you, I love our Lori, and I will never tell you what to do and what not to do. It says in the Torah, the most important thing is sholom bais – peace in the house. And for your information, we also believe in justice. Tsedek, tsedek tirdof. Didn't you learn that in Jewish school?" Elsie looked at her mother with the impatience you reserve for a disobedient child and passed her a plate of homemade strudel.

At least, Mrs. Klein thought, they come to me for Shabbat and the seder and the Rosh Hashanah meal. Moreover, Mrs. Klein never refused to babysit Lori. Elsie and Shel attended frequent clandestine meetings. "But please," Elsie pleaded, "don't fill Lori's head with ridiculous stories."

"Like what?" Her mother asked, knowing full well what her daughter had in mind.

"Like the waters of a sea opening up and people walking across on dry land. Yesterday she asked me if God would open the lake in the country so she could walk across to the other side to play with the children there."

But Mrs. Klein continued to tell her stories, and Lori listened, her dark eyes wide open in awe and concentration.

Years passed and Mrs. Klein succumbed to old age ailments. Elsie sat at her mother's bedside in the hospital until the old woman took her last breath. For the sake of propriety, and out of respect for the observant members of the family, Elsie sat shivah with her brothers, sister, and aunts.

The day after the shivah, and all the visitors and mourners had gone, Elsie drove to the local Judaica shop and purchased a finely decorated mezuzah made in Israel. She hammered nails into both ends of the mezuzah and affixed it to the doorpost, meticulously following the instructions – the upper end pointing inward, the lower one outward. A prominent shin in gold lettering graced the upper end of the case. Elsie looked at her handiwork and was pleased.

"What on earth are you doing?" Shel asked, perplexed.

"I put a mezuzah on the door. Inside a Hebrew inscription is written on special parchment. Two passages from the Book of Deuteronomy: One is the Shema."

"But why?"

"Simple." Elsie faced him and spoke without a hint of uncertainty in her voice. "When Mama's soul visits us from heaven to say a blessing, there has to be a mezuzah on the door, or she won't find us." ■

The Tallit Whisperer

ANNA GERSMAN

Knives twist in my back and heart. I sit with Ariel in shul on Rosh Hashanah – the first without you. Thank God we're a little late and the service has started. We don't have to greet anyone with sad faces, understanding eyes and warm hugs. Taking a deep breath, I open my tallit bag. It's the deep blue velvet one that was yours, a gold Star of David is embroidered on one side. Standing, I hold it up over my eyes, say the blessing, and kiss the fringed corners. Only recently could I do this. Before I sat in my seat and did it unobtrusively hoping no one was watching me. Lately, since you're gone. I force myself to take my place as a Jew.

I stand and whisper the blessing to myself and wrap the tallit around my shoulders. I feel you in its soft folds.

"Does your husband have a tallit?" The funeral director asked.

"Yes." I said.

"Well you don't have to, but if you want, you can bring it. We will bury him in it. If not, then we will provide a tallit. In Jewish tradition, Jews come into this world as they leave the world-naked."

"We want to keep his tallit," I tell him. "My daughters want it."

"I agree with that, people are using tallitot now in different ways. As chupahs for weddings, as baby naming shawls," he says.

We can't part with either of your tallitot or your father's. You are imprinted on them. We can't let them go. Now Ariel has it wrapped around her, your hugeness holding her tight.

Closing my eyes I sit down and hum along. It's 16 years since I converted. The tunes are part of me now. You were happy when I decided to convert. Thrilled to sit in shul again and let prayers and melodies from your childhood wash over us. Powerful rekindled feelings you pass on to our children.

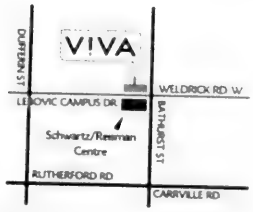
Making Today Great!



Memories of Rachel Market in Montreal

BARRY ROSEN

It was back in Montreal, in the 1950s, when I was a young boychick.

Shortly before Passover, my mother would do her shopping in order to get ready for the holiday. My mother was always very enthusiastic about preparing for the Jewish holidays. It wasn't just the holidays that inspired her enthusiasm – it was knowing how much joy our family derived from her special Jewish cooking. Despite the amount of work she had to do, Passover was her favourite time of year.

On this particular day, I was sleeping soundly, and my mother tried to wake me. "Barry," she said quietly. I didn't wake up. She repeated herself in a louder voice. "Barry it's time to get up." I opened one eye. I was half asleep. My mother repeated herself, this time using my Yiddish name. "Beryl – you have to wake up. We are going shopping today at Rachel Market!"

Because she said the magic words "Rachel Market." I bolted out of bed. To a young boy, the words "Rachel Market" conjured up a real adventure. Of course it wasn't the shopping that I enjoyed. No kid enjoys shopping, unless it's shopping for toys. The exciting part for me was taking the bus and streetcar to get there. To a young boy, Rachel Market seemed so far away, but of course it was not.

When we got to Rachel Market, the sights and sounds were overwhelming. It was noisy, chaotic, and crowded. It was as if every Jewish housewife in Montreal was shopping there for Passover. There was an endless dance between the sellers and the customers – and there was an abundance of both. Over the din, vendors would shout to each passerby, knowing that a potential customer was close at hand: "Hey Mrs., look at my fresh fruits and vegetables – nothing but the best!"

At the market, my mother always met other women who were also shopping for Passover with their little boys or girls. These women always said the same thing to my mother when they saw us. They would smile as they stared at me, and then say: "Dine zun? A shaynem boychick – vie alt is er?" ("Is this your son? He's a beautiful boy - how old is he?") It was as if they were already sizing me up as a potential husband for their five-year-old daughters! It was never too early to arrange for a shidduch!

But the most fascinating part of shopping at Rachel Market was visiting the chicken seller's stall. His name was Mr. Greenspoon, and he not only sold chickens but he was also a shoichet. Today, shoichets still exist but work behind the scenes. In those days he was a much more visible figure. He wore an apron that was splattered with blood, and despite his gruesome job he was friendly and pleasant.

When you went to buy your chicken from the shoichet you didn't need to ask if the chickens were fresh! The chickens were right there in front of you, live, in cages stacked on top of one another. They were noisy, and of course not the tidiest or cleanest creatures on earth. The smells were memorable, and did not encourage you to linger. There were feathers everywhere.

> She did not agree with this logic, nor did she see it as divine.

When I accompanied my mother to the shoichet, things would always follow the same pattern, and today was no exception. My mother greeted Mr. Greenspoon and he greeted her. She asked Mr. Greenspoon to select a chicken. The shoichet stuck his hand in a cage. All the other chickens squawked. My mother, having high standards, looked the chicken over carefully – "too small," she said, rejecting the bird. The shoichet took out a second chicken. This one my mother also rejected as being inadequate. It was only the third chicken that my mother deemed acceptable for our Passover table.

Mr. Greenspoon took the chicken to the back of his stall. There he slaughtered it with a sharp knife in the required kosher manner. He returned with the deceased chicken neatly wrapped up in brown paper tied up with string. My mother asked me to hold the package while she paid Mr. Greenspoon. As I held the package I noticed that it was warm, as if the chicken was still alive. I suddenly felt sorry for the poor bird.

My mother paid for the chicken, and took the package from me. She had heard from a friend earlier that day that Mr. Greenspoon was looking unwell, and she herself thought that he looked pale. "Are you sure you're okay Mr. Greenspoon?" she asked.

"I'm fine, Mrs. Just fine" he responded. She thanked Mr. Greenspoon, and wished him and his family a nice Pesach. He wished her the same, and promptly turned his attention to his next waiting customer.

We then made our way home and I could hardly wait for the adventure of our next shopping trip to Rachel Market.

What my mother and I didn't know was that something disturbing had happened to Mr. Greenspoon.

He had arrived for work early that morning. He brought his caged chickens with him. He opened his stall and placed his chickens on display.

Suddenly, he heard a strange voice. He heard it more than once. The voice said: "Hey you!" He looked around, wondering where the voice came from.

He heard it again: "Hey Greenspoon!" The voice then said: "Avrum Greenspoon, prepare yourself, your life is about to end!" He thought for sure it was Malach HaMoves, the Angel of Death, and he was terrified.

Summoning his courage, he looked around and said bravely "Show yourself!" And who comes out of hiding? Not Malach HaMoves, but rather… one of his chickens! "A talking chicken? That is impossible!" said Mr. Greenspoon. But there it was – in the flesh, feathers and all. A real live talking chicken!

The shoichet and the chicken ended up having a heated confrontation. The shoichet tried to calm the chicken down. He explained that God, each for its own purpose, created everything. Humans were born to eat chickens. Chickens were born to be eaten. And he, the shoichet, was born to slaughter chickens. It was simple, and all parties had to agree to this "divine arrangement."

"Some arrangement!" the chicken retorted. She did not agree with this logic, nor did she see it as divine. Especially the part about chickens being born to be eaten!

The chicken became angrier, and as she grew angrier she grew larger. She soon became as tall as the shoichet! She grabbed a knife from his drawer – the same knife that he used to do his work. There was a terrible scuffle, and the giant chicken ended up straddling the shoichet. This chicken meant business! She was about to cut the shoichet's throat when Mr. Greenspoon, more than a little terrified, started to scream. "Don't kill me! Don't kill me!"

Just then the shoichet heard another voice calling his name, first faintly and then loudly. "Avrum, Avrum." He felt a gentle nudge on his shoulder. "Wake up Avrum; you're having a bad dream!" It was his wife! He woke up.

"Avrum," she said. "You were having a nightmare!"

"Oy Esther," said the shoichet, "it was horrible!" He then explained to his wife what the dream was all about.

His wife comforted him. "OK Avrum, relax, calm down. The nightmare is over. Please try to get some sleep. It's 3 o'clock in the morning, and it will soon be time for you to get up and get ready for work."

But the dream felt so real that Avrum couldn't fall back to sleep. And yet, with so little rest, he still managed to get out of bed at 4 a.m. and open his stall by 6 that day, as usual. No wonder he looked so unwell to my mother as we shopped together for Passover.

But as the old expression goes, everyone (except for the chicken) lived happily ever after, and we all had a great Pesach back in Montreal when I was a young boychick. ■

Shabbat Shalom

FIONA GOLD KROLL

The market is buzzing with people. I stop for a moment gazing at pickled cucumbers floating in wooden barrels filled with brine. Sellers beckon customers to their stalls overflowing with plump red tomatoes, onions and mushrooms. "Sixpence a pound," they yell. Mom shops at her favourite greengrocer and packs paper bags bursting with fruits and vegetables in her mesh shopping bag. I feel my mother's warm hand searching for mine and together we walk hand in hand through Ridley Road.

The butcher's shop is down the street and I run along the sidewalk until I reach the door. Mom's friend is already there and they hug as soon as they see each other. Then Esther makes a beeline for me and I cringe when she plants a large wet kiss on my cheek. The shop is humming as shoppers examine chickens and meat, grumbling about the price to whomever will listen. Then in a quiet voice, Esther speaks to my mother in Yiddish assuming I don't understand what she is saying, but I do. I've been listening to the same words as far back as I can remember. This one's getting a divorce, and that one's moving to Australia. I'm bored with the conversation and begin scraping sawdust into neat piles with the edge of my shoe.

I was born at the Bearsted Memorial Hospital in London, England, across the road from Hampton Court Palace. The hospital was an outgrowth of the Jewish Maternity Hospital in Whitechapel where my parents were born and raised. At the turn of the 20th century, the East End of London became home to thousands of poor Jewish immigrants fleeing the pogroms of Eastern Europe. Some went on to America but many stayed in Britain including my Orthodox grandparents.

I am two when my parents move to suburban London, and I spend the next eight years of my life living in what I consider sublime paradise. The house is large with three levels of gardens at the back and I play outside for hours, immersed in my imaginary world of witches, fairies and goblins.

Every Shabbat, my family attends services at our local shul. I sit beside my father braiding the fringes on his tallit while dad dozes through the sermon. We walk home after kiddush and the aroma of soup and roasted chicken welcomes me as I run up the path towards our house. The pièce de résistance will be lokshen pudding for dessert.

My father passes his driving test and purchases his first car, a used three-wheel enclosed bakers van. My brother and I sit on a blanket in the back, our eyes wide open in wonder and fear as we hold on to each side for dear life. "Lean in everyone!" my father shouts, hoping the van won't tip over when we go around street corners. Within a few months mom presents dad with one of two options: the bakers van or divorce. The van is immediately replaced with a four-wheel car.

During the summer, Saturday afternoons are spent in the garden with family and friends. Adults sit on canvas chairs drinking tea between muffled conversations and fits of laughter. The children play hide and seek behind our large fruit trees with branches heavy with ripening plums and pears. Later in the day, we visit my grandfather. I sniff his silver spice box before he lifts me up on a chair. Then, with his calloused fingers wrapped around mine, we light the braided havdalah candle. My grandfather makes the blessings and blows out the candle. Shabbat is over.

Mom spends the entire month before Pesach cleaning our house. Drapes are removed, washed and rehung; floors and silver are polished. The chimney sweep cleans fireplaces that are not used again until the following winter. Kitchen cupboards are emptied and scrubbed; dad carries musty cardboard boxes containing Passover dishes into the house. Pots and pans are washed and placed on paper-lined shelves for the next eight days. Then "The Order" arrives; large boxes brimming with matzot, dozens of eggs, and an assortment of Passover foods including pickled cucumbers. Dad moves the living room sofa making room for the extended dining room table that mom covers with a fresh white cloth. With borrowed chairs, we somehow squeeze 25 people around a table meant for 12. But, what seders we have, and no one cares about the mismatched plates and cutlery; after all it's Pesach.

My perfect childhood unravels the year before my brother's bar mitzvah. He has a serious accident and doctors are uncertain if he will walk again let alone stand at the bimah singing his parashah. He does, albeit on crutches and yes, he walks again. My grandfather dies soon after and I'm old enough to feel the loss of his warm smile and comforting hugs. Then my uncle dies and I feel the emotional safety net of our tight knit family slipping away sooner than it should. All I can remember is my father saying Kaddish over the next few months. There is no music in our house for almost a year and my parents' pain is palpable.

We move to the other side of London the following year and join a new shul. It is Shabbat as usual. I am 12 and no longer play in the garden; my imaginary games turn into mere memories. My friends are now in walking distance and we listen to pop music at one another's houses, dancing to The Twist by Chubby Checker. My 13th birthday party is exciting in more ways than one. Boys and girls dance the evening away under the watchful eyes of my parents. I'm allowed to wear stockings and kitten heel shoes for the very first time.

Five years later, my father announces we are immigrating to Canada. Actually my parents are also considering America. My father's eldest brother lives in Los Angeles and for me it is a no- brainer; we should go to California. But it's 1966, the war in Vietnam is in full swing and my parents aren't willing to risk my brother being drafted into the U.S. army. I help my mother pack up our personal effects. The Pesach dishes are stored with my uncle in London and never make it to Canada.

> All I can remember is my father saying Kaddish over the next few months

We spend the first winter in Montreal and move to Toronto within a few months. My mother continues to make Pesach with new mismatched dishes. Her shining candlesticks are still placed on the dining room table, though some of the luster is gone. The table is much smaller and family and friends who once sat with us at seders in London are now ghosts from the past.

I reach for my mother's hand; it's not there. Dad, grandpa, where are you? They're all gone now. Am I dreaming?

It's Friday night. I throw a fresh white tablecloth over the dining room table, shaking it once or twice until the cloth settles down. Finally, I run my hand across the top until every last wrinkle is gone. I set the table and call out to my children and grandchildren, "come, help me light the candles."

Shabbat Shalom. ■

A Dialogue On Justice

APRIL LAUFER

"Between you and me..." the words catch in her throat.

He waits.

She tries again. "House arrest. What is that?" A tremor in her voice.

"Well," keeping his voice even, "it means that he has to stay in his house."

She looks at him. "You mean," swallowing a quiver, "he gets to stay in his home."

"Well, it isn't that he 'gets' to stay home," sighing, "but that he is not allowed to leave."

She snorts, "And that is what? Some kind of punishment?"

"It's called house arrest," he says, a shrug in his voice.

"It is nothing."

Silence.

"In today's paper," she continues with a brief glance at him, "they call him an alleged war criminal," shaking her head, her voice bereaved. And then with force, "Alleged? Are you kidding?"

"And what did this war criminal do?"

"Excuse me," she takes a breath. "This 'alleged' war criminal...What did he do?" She pauses; her mind drifting through stories that will never be told. "Does it matter?" A pause, a gulp of air. "He isn't well enough to stand trial."

He has to think of what to say. She is expecting a discussion. Some argument about what should happen. He has nothing.

He grasps at words to fill the emptiness. "Yes, well, I'm sure it would be hard to find witnesses who are still around."

"There are pictures," her voice raised again. "Yes. Of course," he nods. He admires her strength. Her desire for justice. Her desire for a world where there is order and sense.

"All those stories—the video projects, the recordings. And what has come of them? A record for what? What good has come of it?"

"For those who wanted the truth," thinking of his own truth, his own testimony.

"And to what end? To another 'alleged' war criminal?" she lets her anger swell until it fills the room.

"Perhaps, this is all we can do," knowing that his words are empty of meaning.

"There won't be a trial," her voice a whisper now.

"There won't be a trial," he echoes, his voice quiet, hiding his own trembling.

"Do you know they say that unless he gets his trial this 'elderly war crimes suspect' do you know that they argue – presumption of innocence." She shakes her head.

"Justice requires following the law." He answers mechanically.

"For them? " She looks at him. "For them," she says," for them we follow the law?"

"For everyone," he replies.

"So now, when the guy is practically dead, they offer to prosecute him and we are supposed to be satisfied." She was not asking.

"We live in a civilized society."

"Civilized. That he got to live; that my parents were shot?" Tears slipping down her cheeks.

"And what would you do? Take him out and have him shot?"

She is quiet. What would she do? Shoot him? Make him dig his own grave?

In her silence he seems to know what she is thinking. "So the rules of law do not apply to war criminals?"

"Why should they?"

"Because we are civilized." It is the only sane argument.

"Hah," she scoffs. Shoot him? Could I pull the trigger? .....Yes.

"So war criminals don't deserve a trial," he says this as a statement.

"Again? The same testimony. Again."

"The real truth must contain the entire truth," he quotes the remembered text.

"Who said that?" she eyes him suspiciously. "Are you defending this farce?

Wearily rubbing his face with his hands, he asks, "What would justice be?"

"He lived," she replies. "He got to live his life. That can't be justice. "

"No. You are right. It is not justice."

"Tzedek tzedek tirdof. You know," she looks at him, "If a man schemes against another and kills him," she quotes the passage perfectly in the Hebrew, "he is to be put to death."

"'Justice, justice you shall pursue.' But still a trial is required..."

"Oh yes. Yes. But this..." she leaves the sentence hanging in the air.

"Yes?" he wants her to finish. He wants her to make sense of this nowhere argument.

"This is...," she looks at him," this is nothing. To claim that you care about justice! To claim you tried to bring this war criminal to trial but the guy is just too damn old!"

Disappointment sinks into the room.

She looks at him and reaches for his hand.

He looks wonderingly at her, stroking the soft skin of her hand with his fingers. With sadness he asks her, "Should they have done nothing?"

She moves away from him pacing. "That is the point. To think that this is something? 'Elderly' war criminals. As if elderly allows us some sense of compassion because maybe they are old and frail or even in poor health. Who cares? I don't care." She forces her voice louder. "Do you hear me? I don't care."

Silence. Silence.

"If you could face him?" he asks feeling quite lost, "If you could be his judge...?"

"I would spit in his face." I would shoot him she thinks as she massages her liver spotted hands.

"That's it? Nothing more." He says it kindly.

I could pull the trigger she thinks to herself. Out loud she says, "They have waited so long. Waited until almost everyone is gone."

"Yes, you're right. God knows the guy himself could drop dead any moment." He actually laughs at his own words and is surprised that in this small laugh there is a feeling of such heartache.

"And this is justice?" she asks him, quieter now.

"No," he replies. "This is not justice. But....," he hesitates, "Is justice possible?"

She looks at him. It is a trick of his, this questioning. She is afraid of answering, afraid of not answering.

Seeing her pained expression, her hands kneading her arms in a confusion of feelings, he tries to find a way through this black hole.

"Sometimes," he offers in his Talmudic voice, "sometimes all we can do is pursue justice and we must...we must do it in a just manner."

She shakes her head. "What, so some prosecutor or some country can say they did something?" she says with contempt.

"We live in a world where things are not fair." She hears the rhythmic repetition.

If only there was sense to it all. "This doesn't make what they are doing alright," she counters.

"What are they doing?"

"You think people didn't know about this guy for the last 60 years? You think people didn't know where he was living and what he was doing?" Her hurt sits in the air and brings him into her ache, her predicament.

"So, what are you saying?" he tries, "Since we did nothing in the past, we should do nothing now?"

"No. But to pretend that this is justice is wrong." She forces scorn in her voice. The same argument again and again. How is it that justice remains so elusive? How can it be that even in their old age...

She states the obvious. "This 97 year old got to live. He got dressed each morning, got to drink his coffee and eat his breakfast. He never worried that someone would find him."

"They did though."

"Hah. At 97 suddenly they realize he is living next door?" she harrumphs. "The world has waited 75 years to pretend to do justice, and now...," she says.

"Because if you wait until everyone is gone...Who will protest?" he feels so tired but seeing her tears he must keep up with the discussion. He must try. "What would you do to this 97 year old," faltering over the next words, "What would justice look like?"

He waits to hear her answer.

"Torture," she doesn't hesitate.

"You would torture a 97 year old man?" he is surprised by how this makes him feel.

A pause before she answers, "That is a bit of a problem. ...."

"So you wouldn't." A statement.

Only silence in the room. Silence. Tears.

Watching her pain, his hands shake and he wipes at his own tears.

"I want justice for my parents, and my brothers," the words tangled up in her emotion come out hesitantly." She tries again. "I want justice."

Looking at her, remembering her stories, how she cradled her sister as she died in the camps. All those stories. All those horrors. Justice.

"If I could..." he whispers,

"If you could..." asking him to finish his thought.

"I want justice too..." He is afraid. To contemplate this abyss.

"You know," she says looking at him. "You know, age doesn't matter. I do not have to feel pity for him because he is old. He got to live out his years!"

Silence.

Silence.

"He had a full life, didn't he?" and at these words he chokes back a sob.

She touches him gently on his shoulder. Her own tears forgotten in his.

"Well, I hope he is in pain," her voice strong.

"I am sure he has pills," just a thing a person says.

"What? I can't even hope that he is in pain?"

"Does it help?" he asks now feeling a bit ashamed for tossing out platitudes.

"Doesn't it? Doesn't it help a little? To know that he might be suffering?"

"Maybe. I don't know." Then with an anxiety that catches him by surprise. "Is that what justice would look like? If you knew that he was in pain? That he was suffering?"

"You know," she answers carefully. "I don't care if he is in pain. It isn't his physical condition that means anything. Not his age, not his frailties. I want him to feel torment for the things he did. I want him to feel the anguish of those he committed to mass graves. That is the torture I want."

He thinks about this. He thinks of all the discussions they have had. He thinks of the last few survivors. "If we brought together everyone we know, other survivors," pausing to think who is left. "If we were the final tribunal for this man, what would we do?"

She looks at him. "Who is left for this tribunal? You. Me. A handful. Less." She thinks and sighs, sits down beside him. "I think we wouldn't do anything. We're not young anymore." A smile, soft tears. "It was... a long time ago," saying words that do not come from her heart. "It's just sad....to pretend that this is justice."

He rests his head against her shoulder, leaning lightly against her. "You know, there is no measure of justice that could ever make atonement."

With a sigh, "So, there is no justice."

"Bringing a 97 year old to account is something, isn't it?" he suggests as he brings his head up, and sits up straight in his chair.

"How?" she asks. "We agreed nothing is going to happen."

"Because for there to be a sense of righteousness in the world, we must try. Pursuing justice, even after three generations, proves there is a reckoning."

"A little too late. A little too little," she shrugs.

"Yes, yes," he agrees. "Still....since we..." Here he pauses with a glance in her direction gauging how to say the words he does not quite believe. "Still, since justice is not easily defined and, perhaps in this case, it is not even possible..."

She waits.

"Pursuing justice--pursuing truth for the sake of an individual," he continues, " for the sake of society—perhaps that is all that can happen."

Her eyes are seeing another time and place. I could she thinks. He looks at her and takes her hand. ■

The Free Concert

RUTH FRANKEL-GRANER

The August heat has not kept everyone at home this evening. In Walter Randolph Park, the rhythm of the klezmer band— five young men in jeans and corduroys—is so compelling that the audience sitting outside in the turquoise bleachers can't resist tapping their feet and clapping hands. But only Estherelke dances. She must be over 80.

The musicians play on a small wooden stage, with a backdrop of real pine trees and dark green maples that will soon turn red. Estherelke performs on the concrete walk in front of them. The audience watches. She wears lime-coloured capris, a matching tank top, and striped lime and white socks pulled up to her knees, and sandals. She opens her black purse and takes out one very long strand of lime crystal beads and slowly winds them around her neck. They hang almost to her waist. Then, Estherelke tanzt (dances.) When the audience applauds to thank the musicians, she bows and blows kisses back to the spectators.

She repeats the same dance over and over again. Tiny shuffling steps, her arms held above her head, swaying from side to side, dancing every song except the experimental ones— the modern klezmer music. The audience doesn't like the new music either. Estherelke dances only to those klezmer rhythms that has the audience pounding its hands and feet.

When four children—two girls in pale summer dresses and two small boys come down the aisle, and step on to the stage , she waves to them coaxing them to join her. She takes their hands, but one by one, each child slips away. Then the little girls dance together. They raise their arms, and move their feet a little. The boys watch them. Then, the four children create a game. Whenever Estherelke dances near them, they skitter away. Then they slip closer and closer to her, and repeat their fun.

Through it all, Estherelke dances, her swaying, shuffling, arms-up dance. Arms that are uncovered and anyone can see the dark numbers tattooed on her arm. "These?" she answered a neighbour's daughter. "That's my old phone number."

Does she remember a wedding in some far-off time and place, when her hair was long and black, when she lived in a town like my mother's, a shtetl that no longer exists, its inhabitants gone in a single day. Was she the bride? Did she, does she, have children?

The young men in the band play on as though unaware of her presence, her movement, as she dances, alone. Is this what saved her life? Obliterating? Persevering? Dancing? Being for a few moments somewhere else, someplace outside your body. The audience applauding, the musicians held in the moment. Dancing, whirling across the floor, flounced skirt of yellow and red flying, lifted upwards by her partner, the whole troupe moving so rapidly, no one out of step, faster and faster, the stage unable to contain their joy, the irresistible rhythm, the pure rapture of dance.

Dance, Estherelke, dance!

The alternative might be, to cry. ■

Welcome, my friend, to the studio of hunted criminal, Nussbaum. My crime is being Jewish. For this I must pay dearly by giving away my paintings and likely, losing my life. Ah, thank you for the art supplies. They keep me alive.

Landscape with Balloon (Country Road With Felix Nussbaum Painting), 1928
Artist gave to Dr. Grosfils
You are so lucky, they all said. The comfort, the support, the rich paints, canvases, outings with your father, the painter. Anything you could imagine was yours. Like father, like son. No, no. So hard to say no to papa. He ruled everything with his shiny automobile, fancy suits and strong opinions. He owned my easel, owned my brushes, owned the paths and the trees. Squeeze in more colour, brighter, more, more, stop, that's perfect. But then I moved to Berlin. Yes, he still supported me, but from a distance.
I am less afraid to go further, to create messy bogs of colour, tilting trees, and Christian churches. I turn his back to the viewer, and stick myself in the centre. I trap him in a corridor. He can't escape into his auto or his factory. He stands there, alone, swallowed up by my strokes, gazing at me, his heart swelling with pride.

"Painting is perhaps the most important thing to me." My religion was the Berlin Academy of Fine Art;
the Prussian Academy of Art in Rome,
Villa Massimo; the Caspar and Wertheim Galleries, the Berlin Secession, my own studio in Berlin. Out of love for my parents I have kept the Jewish holidays.
"[Is] the closeness between me and my parents . . . God?," I wonder. Papa told me about the vandalism and anti-Semitic defacement of the Osnabruck Jewish cemetery and the new synagogue.

unmoved by the outside world, mouth open, at rest. I am a painted object. Prefer my created face to My nephew was involved in a serious car accident which left him in a coma for a number of months. Bergel, Magence LLP was always there to answer questions, meet with the doctors and therapists to ensure my nephew was getting the best care. Bergel, Magence settled the case for more than $2 million. I was so pleased with the care and attention we received, I have recommended their services to other accident victims. Thank you for the expertise, guidance, dedication and professionalism that the staff portrayed throughout this time.

Roy Y. - Brampton

I injured my hand as a result of a defective product and recovered over $500,000 thanks to the Bergel law firm. From the moment I arrived at the first interview, my injury case was handled in a professional way. The lawyers and staff really did listen to me.
J. C. - North York

Our daughter had a very serious brain injury. We contacted eleven personal injury law firms, none of which were willing to help us. We then contacted the firm of Bergel Magence LLP. We could not have had a more involved team looking after our daughter and her case. Their tenacity, strategy and actual caring for our daughter led to a settlement of more than $1,150,000 and her lawyer is still in contact with us nearly five years later. We highly recommend Bergel, Magence LLP.

Destruction (1), 1933
Left behind in artist's studio when arrested in 1944
My Berlin studio burned down, 150 works, destroyed. Soon after, the Nazis came to power. My world was falling apart. My Rome art school fellowship was cancelled. Felka and I had to leave our artists' paradise. The boycott. My parents fled to Switzerland. I grabbed ink and cardboard, fingers flying, brushing in lost lines, wavy lines, toppling lines, howling lines, strangling lines. We can't go home.

No roof, no path, all ruins. Are we dead? I finished, and signed the lower right. Felt better.

Rapallo (Park in Rapallo), 1934
Left behind in artist's studio when arrested in 1944
Felka and I settled on the Italian Riviera; with funds from papa, as always. The sunlight awakened my hands. I stroked boats and buildings into pure zinc white. Then on to the fishing village of Rapallo, finally, with Mutti and papa – as if we were holidaying, as if the perfect angle of the sun was our only care, as if, as if. I smudge and enlarge the path – what a pleasure to make it curve and escape into the mountain range. I leave the forms behind, lined up, pot and plant, shrub, tree, and building. Trapped luminosity, their colours reach up to leaves bearing witness in emerald green.

Events outside were getting worse. The Nuremberg Laws in 1935. In 1938, Kristallnacht and the deportation of Osnabruck men to Buchenwald. In 1939, over 4,000 works of art, mainly Jewish, were burned outside the Berlin Fire Department; and then the war was declared.

Wanderer – yes; Jew – yes, by exile not by choice. In 1935, Felka and I were allowed into Belgium.
Thank God. Every six months, we had to tear everything down and move in order to renew our resident alien permits. My family fanned out before the sealing of borders to us Jews, criminals. My older brother, Justus, with his family fled to Amsterdam. Mutti and papa, ran from Switzerland to Italy to Cologne, to Amsterdam.

External events kill my hope. In my art cell,

I re-construct events as I choose, and I create hope.

On May 10, 1940, the very same day that the Germans invaded Belgium, I was deported to St. Cyprien, the internment

Self-Portrait with Key, 1941
Artist gave to Dr. Grosfils

St Cyprien was a beach and sand hell locked between ocean and electrified barbed wire. My face is on fire all day. No escape from the sun. Something is rising in my throat. I chortle, scratch, can't get it out. I paint the tension.
Robbed of sky, barbed wire horizon. It takes hours to paint the wire, twist by twist. My titanium-zinc white gives it a heavenly glow. Crave to touch it and be blessed. But my medieval Jew's hat is in the way. We are flattened figures fused into the cage. And there's the key to get us out. To release the key I must undo all the barbed wire. Easy to do in my studio, just paint over and adjust. My choice, to paint or not to paint. So much power, so little. But for me, my world is lemon yellow. I feel my throat relaxing, clearing. The noises continue, louder, higher, my breathing strengthens.

Life is rising in me. My fists curl – inward. My art screams out.
You will notice, my friend, the painting on the other side of this plywood is an early Italian landscape from my art school days in Rome so long ago. [Pause] Supply is so difficult now, that I hope you'll pardon my doubling up. But the Italian plywood is the best.

The end is here. The Gestapo is just have to calm my nerves. I need to paint. Seeing bones everywhere. I make a square. No cafes or people strolling.

The silence scrapes away at my imagination. I used to amuse people with my art. Now, only skeletons come out.

Once upon a time in The Singing Bone fairly tale, when an evil brother killed the rightful hero, my wise German forefathers, the Brothers Grimm, made this prophecy:

"... nothing remains hidden from God, and this evil deed [is] bound to come to light."

Later an innocent shepherd, falling upon a precious little white bone, carved it into a mouthpiece for his horn, which, then of its own accord, sang out the truth.

Dear friend, witness the bones around me. Make the prophecy come true. You are our only hope.

"... do not let my pictures die ...."

...

Denounced, Felix and Felka were arrested in July 1944, and sent to the Malines transit camp. They were murdered upon arrival in Auschwitz on August 3, just one month before the liberation of Brussels. Felix's parents, and his brother and family perished as well.

Forgotten Childhood

JUDY WEINRYB

Strolling idly
on a hot summer's day
I am surprised to find my feet carrying me back in time

Intoxicated
by the sounds and smells of Kensington Market in all its bravado
I have discovered a place that no longer exists

A breath away from the fruit markets and trendy sidewalk cafes
I turn onto a square that feels exquisitely serene

Where tall stately trees and aging Victorian houses are frozen in time

I envision children from long ago enjoying Shabbat Kiddush at the Kiever Shul
then running through the park

To play hopscotch in colourful frocks and well-worn knickers as they scream with delight

Serenaded by the sounds of the knife sharpener shouting for business they run to greet him pet his horse enjoy the candies
he pulls from his satchel

Most days, after school is out and evening descends upon the park the scent of home cooking wafts gently through the air beckoning home the hungry flock to their parents' welcoming arms

Soon the sun has set as mothers sing lullabies to their weary offspring and watch them drift into peaceful slumber

Overwhelmed by the vision of an imagined past
I reflect on the lure of what may have been but is no more

To all our friends, family and the entire Jewish community, we extend our warmest wishes for a Happy, Healthy and Peaceful Passover!

Dear God

how many died? how many murdered? how many cremated? those shot at? knifed or strangled? those enslaved and vanquished? the brave who were shot in rows of thousands? how many children who dreamt of being born murdered in the womb? ten?..a thousand?..a million?..more?

how about the babies experiencing that constant war? the uncaring flames? how may hurled their last cry as they lay dying?..only one?..a hundred?..or a thousand? lying in the reddish-purple like a flowing river? how many Abrahams and Jacobs and Rebeccas must have perished, dissected of their life-rich dreams? how many made their way to you?

and oh yes, the bombed-on civilians? the slain masses going about their tasks? the innocents? the wronged persons? did you see any of those? how many Jews, clueless of their fate, shot in pogroms? starved in ghettos?

or perhaps the martyrs, the Warsaw Ghetto uprisers, the rabbis, the women? the teens? can you tell us, dear G-d: if you can be in two places at the same time, were you there when they were gassed, their smoke spewed into your heavens like a lost generation? and did you see them laugh as they turned your children into ashes? how many made it to your pearly gates?

really, six million is a lot...you must have met some of them up there, dear God...

(from ashes left to linger: a poetic search for closure—no longer in publication)

Head of the Year

MARK GORDON

Rosh in Hebrew means head.
An image rises from the sea of images, this year with the head of a goat,
the head of a bull perhaps, or Janus gazing back, way back, and to the future,
white as the sands of a Greek isle.

I gaze back to warm September days, when I walked to the synagogue with my grandfather, like boys I saw today,
eager and reluctant. Their eyes swivel to the world, then inward to the pouch that hides the silken prayer shawl.

Back then no policemen stood guard seeming embarrassed to look too closely at the men in skull caps hunched in their task,
the women in knee-high boots, perfumed to the roots, their laughter full of lipstick,
their capped teeth challenging the sun.

I resist the temptation to say the Lord's not here, recalling the Lord is everywhere like one of Ezekiel's whirling wheels that touches the edge of each human planet.
Its emerald fire wakens dead eyes to the shimmering elm trees aimed at the sky.

And so another head of the year passes,
my grandfather long since dead.
He died in the middle of his morning walk,
as abruptly as a shriek from the shofar.
His eighty-six-year-old heart folded in the bright Miami sun, as a plane high in the sky with a trailing banner invited one and all to Joe's Oyster Heaven.

Mark Gordon has had numerous poems published in literary journals and anthologies in Canada and the United States, and has two novels published by Groundhog Press, The Kanner Aliyah and Head of the Harbour.

There's Always Next Year

GRANT WALDMAN

Year after year, that's what I've heard:
Next Year in Jerusalem!
What about now? What about:
Right now in Jerusalem?
I am not referring to the physical Jerusalem.
I am talking about the metaphysical Jerusalem.
The Jerusalem of peace.
The Jerusalem of promise.
The Jerusalem of hope.
Hope for understanding.
Hope that all peoples can sit around the seder table
And be compassionate with one another.
Hope that we really try to walk in each other's shoes.
A promise for calmer days ahead.
Days filled with Stories about each other so that we can learn
From one another.
A promise of a Jerusalem for everyone to gather.
A Jerusalem for everyone to return to.
Peace that embraces all peoples of all faiths.
Peace that truly exists in the hearts and minds of all people.
May this come to pass so that our children and their children
Can say "Next Year in Jerusalem" and know that it will be a Jerusalem of hope, promise and peace.
Amen!

Dayeinu

ROSE ROMBERG

As we reach life's autumn season we are reminded by those much wiser among us to live in the present
To live the gift of each new day.
"The quiet moments"
It is the time of reflection
The time of loneliness that memories almost frozen in time invade our thoughts... like a soft breeze floating through the heart and soul.
Causing a deep sigh... perhaps a tear or two and yes even a smile.
To relive welcome cherished moments of a time well spent; away from the "Here and the Now"
For if we become too frail, and the present should fade away...
It is our memories that sustain us and become the Present!

Exposed Shame

EVA GOLDFINGER

All that beautiful flying hair in the shampoo commercials.

Even plain faces look beautiful with beautiful hair.

Round scalp, fragile skin,
veins seen through it, exposed, vulnerable, shamed, bereft of beauty of our pride of our power.

She wanted it.
I cried as I shaved her head.

You Reside Within My Heart

GAIL BERMAN

My dear Father, who I so adored,
You were Called Home by GOD, The Lord.
It was all too soon, far too premature,
But this was the powerful Call of Nature.

I was a little girl,you were my young and vibrant Dad,
What countless memories there were to be had.
You taught me how to play tennis, how to ride a bike,
And many other things which I really did like.

At home, and on vacations, what nice things we did,
Throughout the years, since I was a kid.

Whenever I was sad or sick, you were there with help and a smile,
All of which went far beyond a country mile.

Dear Father, although you may be gone,
Fond memories do I hold, that can never be wrong.
Many things remind me of you,
in generous part,
Because forever, you reside within my Heart.

Wish all our families, friends & clients a very happy, healthy, peaceful and sweet Passover

Three Poems

BRANDON MARLON

Timna Hymn

Along the copper road, through canyons white and pink,
I sought out Solomon's Pillars,
Hathor's ruined shrine,
and ancient mines marked by shaft and pickaxe.

Accompanied only by white-crowned wheaters and rumours of nocturnal wolves hunting in packs,
I ventured deep into endless landscape where the patient acacia raddiana reigns.

Summiting the flat heights of Mount Timna,
I surveyed panoramic vistas, scanning horizons for ancestral traces, skimming lofty ranges and dry riverbeds for remnant footprints of Hebraic forebears.

Beyond Egyptian inscriptions and the Roman cave, my callused feet conveyed me through great arches, past stone monuments shaped as mushrooms,
and within close proximity to twining Spiral Hill.
In the end, I rendered Timna twin soles of old boots;
in return, Timna restored a single soul.

Night with the Goddess

Dusk sets in and soon I am beguiled by the horned diadem of Hathor, whose kohl-rimmed eyes entice
a dazed wanderer dangerously low on water.

Wind carries gentle whispers to my ears, sweet-nothings from a honey-tongued deity adored by pagans who enslaved my ancestors and lashed their backs with leather whips.

Yes, I am seduced, though I surrender nothing to the heathen queen of myth and lore;
tonight, in my weakness and under her spell,
I may well love her in my dreams, body and heart.

But come dawn I'll disavow her charms, even the warmth of her soft mouth,
the rich scent of her thick tresses,
and the delicate caress of her silken limbs…

The Copper Kingdom

Yearning spirit, bring your weariness into a sublime realm of wonders
russet and red,
of sandstone sculpted by erosion and curvaceous valleys shaped by winds.
Stir your senses in the natural embrace of rock formations and sand dunes, where the ibex roams and smelting camps linger, where Kenite and Midianite moiled under blazing sun for precious metal ore and ingot, and cliff walls seduce with hues and musculature.
Come with your longing and troubles into a welcoming oasis of silence and peace;
the ghosts of miners and slaves will greet you amid the expanse of a burgundy-brown heaven.
Here will stale sorrows elapse, and fresh memories enliven.

Aboard the 82

ADINA SIPERMAN

There are millions of buses, subways, trams and trains the world over, chugging along their routes as you read this. They all possess their own eccentricities to let you know which metropolis you are in. Israel's population count may pale in comparison to other cities' tens of millions. Its unique national religion may cause you to overlook it as homogeneous. And yet, despite these factors that may prompt you to discount the Israeli metro system, the six-shekel-and-sixty-agurot fare buys you a firsthand look at the beauty, anxiety and diversity that make up the State of Israel.

Take the 82 route that is currently driving from Tel Aviv to Petah Tikvah. The bus driver, though he has adorned his 45-hour-a-week corner in pictures of his grandchildren, would sooner bite your head off than let you hold up the line. The elderly Hungarian woman, decorated in jewels that she has been wearing since she smuggled them out of Budapest and into Palestine as a young girl, boards and is given a seat by the brooding, punk teenager, his eyes lined in black and his hair dyed purple.

There are the religious women – recently graduated, newly married and already with life in their wombs – who whisper the ancient psalms on their lips from station to station. The black-hatted, wool-swaddled rabbis edge to the back of the bus, fearful of grazing the provocatively dressed woman who they observe has been surgically enhanced.

The bus idles at Kikar Rabin to pick up university students with algorithms and equations running through their heads. Their cell phones ring with calls from friends who they met in India, offering ideas of startups and exit strategies. The bus stops at the Arlozorov Terminal to let on young soldiers, barely rid of their baby fat and unable to grow a full beard. They board the bus with overnight bags strapped to their backs, machine guns hanging at their sides and bags of chocolate milk dangling from their mouths. Though they just finished a two-week operation, witnessing the horrors of war, all they long for is a fresh pair of socks.

ROSTISLAV GLINSKY / SHUTTERSTOCK.COM

The Eritreans get off at the corner store, ready to start a shift selling cucumbers and cigarettes. The Sudanese don their kitchen coats, preparing to roll sushi at an upscale restaurant on Rothschild Boulevard. The Filipinos wipe cottage cheese from the aged mouths of their elderly patients. All of them send money home and count the days on the calendar as their work visas quickly expire.

And entangled within this seemingly unrelated, motley crew of commuters is a single, common fear. No matter how engrossed the women are in their psalms and the teenagers in their iPhones and the students in their textbooks, they all keep their eyes on the door. They are looking for that man whose eyes are a little too black, beard a little too long and jacket bulging from beneath. When that type boards, everyone reaches for the button to get off at the next stop. ■

After the Beginning of the End of Times

ADINA SIPERMAN

Chava Kedem straightened her sheitel and clasped her hands in her lap. She smoothed out her long corduroy skirt and tugged her sleeves to cover her wrists. The scrap of paper on which the number '3' had been printed was damp from her moist hands.

The waiting room was filled with people pacing up and down the linoleum floor, flipping through outdated magazines and tapping their feet against the chair legs. Careful not to appear rude, Chava refrained from staring at the others and instead, sat quietly and prayed.

The number on the electronic counter moved forward. Chava stood up and walked towards the frosted glass paneled, unmarked door. She entered the office wallpapered in file cabinets. Stacks of manila folders sat on windowsills, chairs and shelves. Behind the desk sat a balding man in a buttoned, beige shirt. His tie was loosened, his sleeves rolled up and his shirt's armpits stained with yellow moisture.

"Hello," she said quietly.

He looked up to find Chava waiting in the doorway.

"Please," looking down at the name on the file opened in front of him. "Chava. Come in, come in. Sit down,"he said with a smile, pointing to a chair upholstered in forest green, nubbly fabric.

He reached for his reading glasses that hung from a cord around his neck. For several minutes he scanned the pages, flipping back and forth and mmmhhhmmm-ing every so often.

"Alright. I see." He peered at her over the bifocals resting on the tip of his nose. "An interesting life you've lived, Chava. Full of virtue, piety and reverence for Hashem, blessed be His name." He flipped forward some pages. "You upheld the sanctity of marriage, and that of 'be fruitful and multiply,' bearing 10 Jewish children.

"Hmm, there seem to be some discrepancies in your file."

Chava sat straighter in her chair.

"According to my notes, you owned a sweater that was a blend of linen and wool, violating the law of shatnez as dictated in the books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy. Chava, I believe that you should have known better. That garment should have been taken to your Rebbe for inspection."

Chava's cheeks turned a rosy hue. She whispered, "Oh, sir. I can't even imagine which sweater…"

Not seeming to hear her, he made some notes in the file and flipped back several pages. "Ahhh, I see. When you were 26, you went on a trip with your husband to Croatia. When your car broke down, you spent one Shabbat in the town of Zlatar. That town was not surrounded by a piece of string or wire, as dictated by the law of Eruv, clearly outlined in the Gemara Tractate Eruvin. You carried a piece of tissue in your pocket, thus violating the aforementioned law."

Chava shifted in her seat and fidgeted with the scrap of paper she still held in her hand. "I assure you that had I known, I never would have done something so foolish," she said.

He peered over at her through his glasses and nodded. "Lastly, there were multiple violations of the fourth commandment, 'Remember the Shabbat day, to keep it holy' as decreed in the Book of Exodus. You unknowingly transgressed through a number of actions that are considered to be work. The lightbulb in your refrigerator was kept screwed in. Hence, you lit

There seem to be some discrepancies in your life a flame every time you opened the door from sundown to sundown. As well, the slotted spoon that you designated for cholent violated the Shabbat commandment. The openings in the spoon make it a special utensil, constituting work."

He flipped back to the front of the folder and turned towards an accounting calculator on his desk. As he clicked on the keys, the roll of paper fed through the slot and lengthened. "If we take your charity into account…oh and the time that you hosted the underprivileged orphans in your home…carry the one – "

"Sir, with all due respect," Chava said. "I don't mean to dispute the law or discredit Hashem's judgment, blessed be His –"

"One moment, please. You wouldn't want me to miscalculate," he said. He looked up at her with a smile. "Chava, don't look so worried. I'm just pulling your leg. Truth be told, it's policy to see that you live with the fear of Hashem, blessed be His name, in your heart." He laughed a hearty laugh and pointed at her. "I can see from the look on your face that you get a full pass for that one."

He leaned towards her and said in a hushed voice, "Between you and me, none of those 613 made the slightest bit of difference. You didn't need that sheitel, the separate plates or the rain water." He pointed upward. "He doesn't need rules to determine the purity of one's soul." His hand swatted the air, as if to disregard the foolery. "You were in before you were even born."

He stamped the front page of Chava's file with a large green stamp that read, "Pass." Pointing to a frosted glass paneled, unmarked door to his right, he said, "Chava, it was a pleasure to have met you. Just through that door. NEXT." ■

Regarding the pain of others

KENNETH SHERMAN

The sight of suffering sews shut my lips.

I am like the donkey that carried Isaac.

I feel the heat, the sharp stones,
the weight of wood and axe.

I know the knife's intent and it leaves me speechless.

I hear the rustling of the ram, his horns caught in the devious bush and I think of God's partial angel who does everything to help Abraham, and does nothing for the ram.

So near and yet so far

BENA SINGER

He was in the hospital.
Directly across the road
I would turn on the light
To show him where I was

How he wished he could Share the summer breeze
To be beside me
And be caressed by the leaves

He is in another dimension
But his remains are here
I look at his stone
A tribute oh so dear

Today, a new born
Now has his name
When the rabbi called it out
I could see him smiling again

Life is a perpetual circle
An inextinguished candle
With angels hovering about
To lighten our sadness

Passover Memories

DOROTHY GOLDWATER

At the tender age of four I welcomed Elijah at our door
That act had a magic appeal making it seem very real.
When I reached the age of nine I drank four cups of wine
Which made me fall asleep- the seder became too deep.
When I reached my teens I knew what Passover really means
More than tasty victuals and strictly followed rituals.
Freedom as a birthright won through a nation's might Wholly dedicated to one God symbolized by Moses' rod.
Unity and freedom achieved by a nation not aggrieved
By disbelief or disunity but a strong caring community.
Our truly miraculous rebirth fills us with joyful mirth
A nation in our own homeland is an achievement very grand.
Yet there is an ominous cloud and thunderclap so loud
Blocking the bright sunshine, threatening our land so fine
Again we must defend our name and survive the enemy's game
Of hatred and suppression and constant libelous denigration.
The words repeated each year recalling the suffering and fear
When the Egyptians were our foes and made us suffer woes
Until God came to our relief and gave us constant belief.
This must ring loudly in our ears quelling all our fears
With faith in our history and trust in its deep mystery
Yearly in all corners of the earth Jews sing out with mirth.
No matter how many seders I attend a magic aura they lend
To the guests who are there in the spirit of freedom we share.

Yom Kippur Day

MAX SKUY

'Tis Yom Kippur Day
'Tis a Holy Day
'Tis a day to pray
'Tis Yom Kippur Day

Jews know 'tis Yom Kippur Day
Jews know 'tis a Holy Day
Jews know 'tis a day to pray
Jews know 'tis Yom Kippur Day

Their sins upon the water they did cast
This judgment day they will fast
At yizkor they will shed a tear
This judgment day that they do fear

This evening service is over at last
The time has come to break the fast
Will they call a spade a spade
And stick to promises that they made

Regretfully as it may be
We will be barking up the wrong tree
To think that they will change their way
'Twill be the same next Yom Kippur Day

We wish you peace and joy at Passover.

Hosanna Johanna Hosanna to Scarlett Johannson, in adoration

JOSEPH CURRY

(And with due apologies to the Right Honourable Stephen Harper, chivalrous Prime Minister of Canada, to whom panegyrics are due for his peerless fealty to Zion. Given the graces of my Muse, however, I trust he will – if not countenance – at the very least bemusedly suffer my dalliance.)

'Some moralist or mythological poet
Compares the solitary soul to a swan;
I am satisfied with that ...'
William Butler Yeats, Nineteen Hundred and Nineteen.

'... O but how tautological of me!
Why even broach her brain?
Like the man said:
"There ain't nothin' like a dame!'"

'To you he comes, Ladies and Gentlemen!
Live! From Paradiso with swing!
Yes, him:
The Lean Lark, the Boney Baritone,
The Voice!

'... And if implored to opine on her design,
Tota dilecta would do!
That's Latin don'tcha' know!
Means "all lovely", from tresses to toes;
(Polished orange per chance ... to dream?)
And how might I sing of that smile?!
Of that face?! – Nay, pardon moi: "visage"!
So utterly Botticelli.

'Now let us recall, kind Cats and Dolls,
My erstwhile predilection for carnalogical ruptures;
My venal – albeit ever svelte – underbelly;
Say that single year of heathen
Tumultuousness, married to Miss Abyss!
Insufferable was I.
But this is one joint, Jack, 'xpects more of its troubadours!

Of her heart I thereby sing!
Of her lioness heart!
Of Scarlett cœur de lionne!
Of Scarlett of the Scarlet Letter Z –
Emblazoned with aplomb!

'Hosanna Johanna Hosanna!
Hosanna Johanna Hosanna!

A shot heard round the Heavens that was!
Right round, then down;
Right down, then twixt;
Right betwixt the eyes!
Take that Oxsham! ...
Travesty International! ...
Human Rights Schlock! ...
And so on ad ... Palestineam!

'Armada Loca beware! There's a new Vestal Fair!

'Now it's likely they'll set out – flanked, no doubt,
By the trolls of Tinsel Town,
And the tramps:
"To the brocades, girlfriends, to the brocades"!
(Is it any wonder I went with The Gipper?!)

'But naught will come of this demimonde;
De ces tristes demimondistes
S' engager pour les damnés de La terreur!
(Say! Not bad for a boy from Hoboken, huh?)
They've a run in their fatigues,
They do, this Nip 'n Tuck Brigade;
Each fanny reconfigured, a portrait of Che.

Of her heart I thereby sing!
Of her lioness heart!
Of Scarlett cœur de lionne!
Of Scarlett of the Scarlet Letter Z –
Emblazoned with aplomb!
'Hosanna Johanna Hosanna!
Hosanna Johanna Hosanna!

Sanguine were our songs
When America was young.
But then,
Mine was the Greatest Generation;
And McCarthyites were on the Right;
And even college boys knew right from wrong;
Yes, sanguine were our songs –
Sanguine our Songbook!
(Many a Chosen were its authors after all).

'Zev's boys at Emma's harbour did alight,
To herald the winsome news: "Jews Fight for the Right to Fight"!
And we did rally to that flag,
To that flag as gorgeous as Ol' Glory!

'Then the man who would be Cyrus,
Saul he seemed!
True, for only a lark –
By dint of Muslim treachery;
And the Arabistry, of Foggy-Bottom.
But enough to stay the Righteous Hand Davidian, Raised o'er Hagar's hydra.
Yet we did praise HASHEM and help pass the ammunition!

Yes, sanguine were our songs.

But never so sanguine as Scarlett;
Never so scarlet as Scarlett –
As scarlet as Scarlett who stands alone!

'Of her heart I thereby sing!
Of her lioness heart!
Of Scarlett cœur de lionne!
Of Scarlett of the Scarlet Letter Z –
Emblazoned with aplomb!

'Hosanna Johanna Hosanna!
Hosanna Johanna Hosanna'!

And lo! The crescendo,
Ere the record doth spin to a close!
And all the Heavenly Hosts applaud –
Yea! Unto him a soaring ovation:

'Beloved Rake!
Immortal Troubadour!
Sing forever more'!

And behold! Unto her a firmament afire!
And all the Heavenly Hosts, lilting, align
To compose the Ultimate Letter.
The Ultimate Letter to honour this beauteous creature!
Truly, so fair; truly, truly, so rare.

As rare as the blackest swan –
The sinuous bridal-black Swan of Swans,
Whom the azure waters of Eden leave lithe
Upon their gentle ripples.
Lithe and impervious,
To far yon Acheron's nether mouth, whence spews the ultimata.

Now hark! Unto her the lasting exultation,
In cadence d'Oc:
'Lustrous Lady! Incarnate Song!
Forever your cœur de lionne'!

Now hush! The Voice, off stage (cadence Yankee-doodley-fun):
'Say Bartender!
If you please ... A Whiskey-SodaStream ...
I mean,
What's a boy-singer gotta do to get a drink around here anyhows'?!

The Lonely God Of Faith

HAROLD PUPKO

A mischievous student once tried to tie the Potzker Rebbe up in mental knots.

"Rebbe, can you explain everything with one word?" he asked.

"Everything?" replied the Rebbe, scratching his chin quizzically.

Sensing that he had the Rebbe on the ropes, the student smugly replied with the Hebrew word for everything: "Hakol."

"Havel," responded the Rebbe with a compassionate grin. "You recite the answer to your question every morning in your prayers."

Deflated by an awareness of the impertinence that permeated his impermanence, the student humbly sought redemption in the Rebbe's eyes.

"I see," replied the student. "You are saying that everything is havel, or vanity, as taught in the second verse of Ecclesiastes, 'Vanity upon vanities, everything is vanity.'"

The Rebbe responded: "I prefer to translate the word havel as breath, so the teaching of Ecclesiastes is: 'Unappreciated breath in, upon unnoticed breath out, everything can be understood through the metaphor of breath.'

"But, to fully comprehend the lesson that you seek, turn to the book of Genesis. There, you will find an answer to your question in the story of Havel, or Abel as he is known in English literature.

"Come, meet me in the text."

And so, the Potzker began his teaching:

Adam acquired intimate knowledge of Eve, his wife, and together, they conceived the future. Nine months later, Eve gave birth to a boy.

And Eve exclaimed: "I have acquired a little man, a god for me." And so she named him Cain, a play on the word canaa, to acquire, for up until that point, she had owned nothing beyond her own skin.

Immediately following Cain's birth, Eve delivered another son. During that difficult and painful process, Eve feared that she might never again own another breath, so she named that son Breath, or Abel, to remind herself never to procreate again.

Cain became a farmer and Abel became a shepherd.

One day, when her children had reached the age of bar mitzvah and she thought that they were old enough to understand, Eve taught her sons about the Creator of All, and how He had exiled their parents from Paradise because of a simple misunderstanding.

Cain and Abel were frightened by the tale, so, that very day, they sought to appease the Creator. Cain presented before Him an offering of the finest vegan treats he could find, while Abel presented the fattest of his lambs.

And a lightning bolt from the heavens struck the lambs. And even Cain the vegan was entranced by the delightful smell of roasted lamb.

And Cain and Abel waited for the heavens to send down a lightning bolt to roast the vegetables.

And they waited.

And waited.

And waited.

And Cain's face fell, and was further contorted by sadness and anger. Abel, being attuned to his brother's emotions in the manner that only twins are capable of, gave Cain a reassuring brotherly hug, and silently returned to the fields to tend to his flock.

And the Creator revealed Himself to Cain and said:

"Why so serious? Do you really think that you can control Me with vegetables? I understand your hope that, through prayers and sacrifices, I will agree to grant your wishes. But I have the right to refuse to accept those requests, and sometimes, if you search within those moments that disappoint, you will find valuable lessons. Shema, pay attention, for the answers to your prayers may come from you listening to yourself. Today's lesson is that you are created in My image. We both have the capacity for freedom of choice. If your choice is good, your spirit will be lifted up.

But beware, time judges choices, for what may initially appear to be good choices may ultimately miss their mark. The consequences of mistakes are like predators, lying in wait for an opening, ready to pounce at you. But I, Creator of All, have faith that, should your mistakes come back to bite you, that you can prevail. You have my word, for I am God."

Cain, somewhat confused by the Creator's muddled teachings, focussed on His closing words. Cain believed that He was God, just as his mother had taught him, so he went out to the fields to seek reassurance from his brother.

"Who is God?" Cain asked Abel.

Abel's understanding of God's essence was gained through the warm silence that he experienced while tending to his flock while out in the green pastures. Abel tried to convey that understanding to his brother by silently mouthing the letter Aleph.

Silence collided with fury.

"What is the name of God?" pressed Cain angrily.

Abel, knowing that his brother enjoyed riddles, replied: "If you say His name, He disappears."

The only thing that disappeared was Cain's self-control. He grabbed Abel by the throat, hoping to extract the name. All Cain managed to do was to squeeze the last breath out of his brother. Abel lay motionless at Cain's feet, which only infuriated Cain further.

"First you play the riddler, and now the joker? Enough!" he screamed at Abel.

God reappeared to Cain, and asked: "Where is the breath of your brother?"

At that moment, Cain became aware that Abel had ceased breathing, and was not just feigning sleep. Cain was struck by the cold silence of his brother's body.

"How should I know where his breath is? I am just a kid," replied Cain. "Mother taught us that You breathed the breath of life into our father and into each of us, so You are the keeper of breath. Or are you saying that I am the keeper of Abel's breath? Am I my brother's keeper?"

Panicking over that possibility, Cain grabbed Abel's staff and poked at his brother repeatedly, hoping to restore breath to Abel, and thereby avoid angering the temperamental God that his mother had warned him about. He poked and he poked, more forcefully each time, with strength that he did not know he had, until blood poured forth.

God's face fell.

Shattered by His failure to protect the only human being with whom He had found the beginnings of true companionship, God struggled to regain His bearings. Contemplating His own reflection in the waters of the oceans, God saw, within His own eyes, an expression that He had only previously seen in humans: the look of shame.

God thought to Himself, "No man can see this face and live."

Turning to Cain, He struggled to find words to express his distress.

"What have you done? The Earth cries, having tasted the blood of your brother. You have cursed yourself, for she will no longer share her strength with you because of your weakness. As for us, I must hide My face from you. You are on your own now. Go to the land of Nod and accept your fate as an exiled son descended from exiled parents, a stranger, forever wandering among the others."

Cain could not believe his ears.

"The others? The only humans left in the world are my parents and I. What are you talking about?"

God explained.

"When I decided to create humanity, I said to Earth, come, let us marry, and let us create offspring. Come, let us make man. You provide the materials, and I will provide the spirit, and through humanity, we shall fulfill our potential for good. For I am a king without servants, and you are a queen without subjects.

"Earth was reluctant at first, but I prevailed in persuading her to share My vision, and we joyously created the rainbow as a symbolic reminder of that moment. She provided the water, and I, the light. We then proceeded to create preliminary versions of hominins, such as the Neanderthals, ironing out the kinks along the way. We eventually created your family, with the hope that you people would be different than the others and demonstrate a capacity to rejoice in life with both Myself and Earth. But only Abel developed that ability, and now, he no longer connects me to Earth. Perhaps Earth was right all along. Perhaps creating mankind was a mistake. Perhaps I should destroy humanity now."

Cain, now fully aware of his own mortality, found himself caught between the possibility of meeting his end through an act of despair by the Creator of Destruction, and the possibility of potentially becoming the victim of a bloodthirsty xenophobic mob in Nod.

A sickly dread gave way to a revelation.

Cain chose to reflect God's earlier lesson back to Him in order to save his own neck.

"My punishment in being unable to comfort You in Your pain is more than I can bear. But was it not You who taught me that, when mistakes come back to bite, one can prevail? Humans will eventually turn out as You designed them, and choose to live up to their potential for good. You have to have faith in freedom of choice. You have no choice."

God found a temporary refuge from His shame in Cain's words, but could not reverse Cain's destiny as a wanderer. Realizing that Cain's life was vulnerable to predation by the inhabitants of Nod, the Creator of All decided to protect Cain.

First, He provided Cain with a canine companion, the world's first service dog, tasked with the job of protecting its master. Understanding that those who hate look through their victims until all they see are objects, God took light left over from the first day of Creation and concentrated that light to rest within a twinkle in the eyes of Cain and his dog. In doing so, He hoped that whoever would look into those eyes with a cold-hearted intent to harm would feel the warmth of the divine, and have no choice but to exercise self-restraint.

And so, Cain and his dog Levi spent their days melting hearts in the land of Nod, spectacularly surviving through the protective powers of specular highlights.

Many years passed, and God saw that mankind continued to deviate from the path that He had planned for it. He maintained His faith in man's potential to freely choose the path of moral evolution, but that faith was eroded daily by the forces of reality.

Nevertheless, God patiently waited.

And waited.

And waited.

And waited.

And just as He, in the depths of despair, was ready to wash the planet of all earthly inhabitants, God noticed Noah, an individual who stood out from all the others.

And God said to Noah: "For every outside, there is an inside. You are alone in the world, and so am I. Come, let us be on the inside together, and let us repair the world, for every inside requires an outside. Are you on board with me?"

Noah found himself lost in the shadow of God's tower of babble.

Confused and humbled by God's revelation, Noah responded with the profound power of simplicity.

"To life" he replied, raising a glass of wine skyward.

And so, God, desperate to reboot His vision of a unified humanity, put his faith in Noah and his family.

However, Noah's descendants, devoid of compassion for God and His utopian vision, found comfort in their own passions.

And, through the ensuing loneliness, God awakened to mankind's limitations in appreciating the unity of His Oneness and His Noneness.

But He never lost His faith.

Downsizing

MARGIE GOLICK

At my time of life it isn't surprising-
A theme that's recurrent-the need for downsizing
The meaning was once one to which I relate
It meant slimming and trading Size 12 for Size 8
But now it's a question of giving up greed
Letting go of those treasures I really don't need

While watching a DVD I suddenly pause it
To reflect on the garments that hang in my closet.
The closet is packed with trousers and skirts
And blouses and belts and all kinds of shirts:

Cotton, acrylic, polyester and knits
They're faded and worn but I love them to bits.
I know perfectly well there is way too much stuff
But what to get rid of...you've got to be tough!

Out with the out of style, forego the fads
Farewell fur collars and big shoulder pads
And T-shirts with logos. So long to the trends
But wait! You can't turn your back on old friends

Here's a gown to give away.
It's looking pretty shabby
But that dress looked great on Maggie Smith -
Last night on Downton Abbey

I fondly remember my grandson's bar mitzvah
And cherished the outfit I wore
I'm saving it still for another occasion
And now he just turned 24

There are too many glasses and goblets and mugs
And sandals and sneakers and three pairs of Uggs
And catalogues, magazines piled on the floor
And on every spare surface - tchotchkes galore

From the very first moment I get out of bed
A continuous dialogue speaks in my head
There's my good self who strives for a life without clutter
And the bad guy who hoards stuff like some kind of nutter

"Forty-two scarves - I really don't need them"
"They're doing no harm - you don't have to feed them"
"Twenty-three house plants. Why do I breed them?"
"They aren't any bother. You don't have to weed them"
"Hundreds of books. It's time that I freed them"
"They look nice on the shelf and you don't have to read them"

Soon I'll be mad as Hamlet's Ophelia
All cause of too many memorabilia

Leah's Yellow Dress

JULIE BERGMAN

"My dress!" Leah cried. "What are you doing with my dress?"

Leah's mother placed the folded dress into a box. "This dress is too small for you," she said. "It's time to give it away."

Leah grabbed the dress and hugged it to her chest. "But it's my favourite dress!" she exclaimed. "Auntie Molly gave it to me for my birthday."

Leah's dress was bright yellow. Tiny white polka dots decorated the fabric. A lace sash tied around the waist. It was beautiful with a sparkly, heart-shaped pin on the collar. Leah had placed the pin there herself.

"Our synagogue is collecting clothing and toys for Jewish families in our community," Leah's mother explained.

"Why?" asked Leah.

"Because there are lots of families who do not have as much as we do," her mother replied. "Helping others is called charity. In Hebrew, we say tzedakah."

"Tzedakah," Leah repeated.

"Don't you think it would be nice to give tzedakah and share your dress with another little Jewish girl?" Her mother asked. "A girl who isn't as lucky as you to have such nice clothes?"

Leah nodded. She handed the dress back to her mother.

The next day, Leah and her mother delivered the boxes. The synagogue was full of activity.

Leah spotted Sophia from across the room. Sophia was a new girl in her class. She moved from Russia a few weeks ago. Sophia was small and quiet. She spoke little English.

"Sophia," Leah shouted.

Sophia looked at Leah. Her eyes widened and she quickly turned away.

Leah frowned. "I guess she didn't hear me," she said.

A few days later, Leah arrived early to school. She played in the playground while waiting for the morning bell to ring. From the top of the slide, Leah saw Sophia skip into the yard. She looked so happy.

I wonder why Sophia's smile is so big today, thought Leah.

Then Leah noticed.

Sophia wore a bright yellow dress. Tiny white polka dots decorated the fabric. A lace sash tied around the waist. It was beautiful with a sparkly, heart-shaped pin on the collar.

"My dress," Leah mumbled. "She's wearing my dress. Sophia wasn't at the synagogue to give tzedakah; Sophia was there to get tzedakah."

Leah watched as Sophia held the bottom of the dress and twirled around and around. She held her head high and danced like a graceful ballerina. Leah felt proud. She knew that her dress made Sophia feel wonderful.

That evening, Auntie Molly came to visit. As usual, she brought Leah a present - a soft, cuddly stuffed bear.

"Auntie Molly?" Leah asked. "Why do you always do such nice things for me?"

"Because I love you," Auntie Molly answered. "You're my family. Don't you do nice things for your family?"

"I help Mommy set the table for Shabbat," Leah said.

"That's a nice thing to do," Auntie Molly answered. "Don't you feel good when you do nice things for other people too?"

Leah thought about Sophia. "Like giving tzedakah?" she asked. "Like helping another Jewish girl who doesn't have as much as me?"

"Exactly," Auntie Molly said. "Jews all over the world are like one big family. You already know that loving your family makes you feel special. Well, caring for Jews everywhere makes you feel extra special."

Leah smiled. Auntie Molly was right. Today, she did feel extra special.

Leah went to her room and gathered a box full of stuffed animals and games. The next day, she and her mother delivered the toys to the synagogue. Auntie Molly said it was OK for Leah to donate her new bear, but Leah had other plans for that toy.

A few days later, Leah arrived early to school. She played in the playground while waiting for the morning bell to ring. From the top of the slide, Leah saw Sophia. She swooped down and ran over to her.

"Hi Sophia," Leah said, holding out the soft, cuddly stuffed bear. "I have a present for you."

"For me?" Sophia asked. "Why?"

"Because this bear needs a new home," Leah said. "You just moved to this country. You now have a new home! Besides, you and I are like family. Don't you do nice things for your family?"

"Thank you," Sophia said, hugging the bear. "In Russian, we say spasiba."

"Spasiba," Leah repeated.

Leah smiled. Sophia smiled too. Today, they both felt extra special. ■

The Timeless Bond A tribute to my mother

DORIS WALSH

My grandmother's heavy brass candlesticks take me back in time to the very early 1900s. Somewhere in Eastern Russia the houses resemble wooden shacks lining the unpaved roads

It is winter and snow covers the surrounding grounds .

The Sabbath is approaching.

It has been a long hard day but the evening will be warm inside the larger dining area.The table is covered over by a spotless white tablecloth. A large pot of flowers brought in by a traveling florist brightens the room. On the table sits a braided bread, a salt shaker, an empty wine cup and three large heavy candlesticks supporting three yellow candles. In my mind's eye she is young, perhaps newly wed. She is wearing a simple white blouse and a colourful blue skirt. Her beloved returns earlier than usual to join her.

The sun is just nestling into its resting place for the evening and its silvery companion is ready to show her luminous face. Time is passing and the movement beneath her feet is imperceptible. The ritual of lighting the candles begins as she dons her headscarf .

Fast forward to 2014.

The surroundings are utterly different but the candlesticks are the same ones carried over many miles to sit on my Sabbath table in Montreal. They have been arranged side by side with loving hands, I await sunset. I cover my head, light the candles and shield my eyes from the rising flames. These are sacred seconds when I have the ear of the Almighty to express gratitude or plead for assistance. The window of spiritual moments brings me extreme peace and bestows empowerment as a new Sabbath is ushered in .

Amen. ■

stitched on your forearm, drawing my eyes
to where they shouldn't stare.

You'd sit at the cedar picnic table with your nephew's morning catch the corrugated shears to clip fins, the thin blade

you ran along white bellies, the gentle lessons

they tumbled out like gleaming jewels.

I recall your hand
cradling a diaphanous sack

"The mamma's eggs," you said holding them to the raw August light.
Squinting,
you let out a shrill laugh.

Were you mad,
I sometimes wondered,
thinking of where you had been.

In the grey galvanized the astonished bass heads gaping

DOROTHY GLICK

It is you who brings me now beyond the surface of pages to what is no longer a story.

There you are bedded in this case of wood and glass, your face fervent and full with the same passion for life – to be, to love, to give over, to embrace that stirs in every one eager to speak the everyday cares (cradling, cleaning, cooking) in a language no more extraordinary than "tomorrow."

I wish there was an answer to give you – something that makes sense while waiting for those no longer expected.

It has been decades now since you were restored to this place, to another life and who will not stay– not long enough to bury those monstrous deeds deep in the turnings of memories.

Operation Passover 1985

MASHA RUTITSKY

There are extraordinary events in our lives that stay with us forever and you remember the details as if they happened yesterday. It so happens that the events of Passover 1985 are still quite vivid and I remember them very well.

The weather in Toronto that spring was still mostly cool, with some sunny days. But the news from the Soviet Union started hinting that the political thaw began: Mikhail Gorbachev came to power.

My family and I had not seen my elder sister for about 15 years. I was lucky to leave Lithuania for Israel in 1973, then Canada in 1977, but my sister lived with her family in the city of Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan, so far away from us.

Rare phonecalls and letters, screened by the KGB, were the only ways of communication between us. Imagine how much we were missing each other, but the opportunities to reunite were quite slim, they had no chance to emigrate.

In my wildest dreams I could not predict what kind of adventure was waiting for me at that time of the year, a real Passover miracle.

Passover was fast approaching. Jews around the world were getting ready to celebrate this very special and meaningful holiday. Little did I know that instead of sitting at the seder table with my family and friends in Toronto, my aging mother and I, would be walking the streets of Bucharest and Budapest, searching for the tour group from USSR (Alma-Ata), hopefully with my sister in it. Both East European countries were Soviet satellites then, run and controlled by KGB.

It all started with the telegram that we received from my sister, which included only the date of the group's arrival to Bucharest and some number. First of all, her arrival was due in less than a week, and second of all, what was the number for? Being familiar with the Russian conspiracy, we assumed that it meant the tourist group number.

We both needed new passports, as ours had expired. It takes a week or more to make new ones, so our travel seemed unlikely. I was determined to make it happen for my mother and me. I took the telegram, our documents and went downtown to the office to get new passports. They said the telegram worked only in extreme situations, not ours. I explained the whole situation and told them if they refuse, it would be like a death verdict, never to see our relative again. It worked! They promised to make passports ready for pick-up on the day we were going to the airport. We expressed our deepest appreciation.

With the help of our friends we booked our flight with Lufthansa via Frankfurt, to Bucharest. The price was astronomical, because we were flying in two days! We had no idea or information about the city, or country, or hotel; nothing.

People at my work were also supportive in everything, even financially, and gave good advice to take with us a few cartons of American cigarettes, like Camel, from the duty free, as a "currency." These were real miracle makers for us there, perfect door openers for needed information!

We had just one day for packing our own clothes and various gifts for my sister. The American dollars and Visa credit card were our valuables, added to precious Canadian passports. We left my eight-year-old daughter with my twin sister.

And so, as the Jewish people were sitting at the seder tables, we were sitting in our seats on a transatlantic flight to Europe, dreaming about our long awaited meeting with my sister. It was so unpredictable what was waiting for us there. And we were absolutely right to fear all kinds of unusual situations, KGB scrutiny and threats.

We endured both flights pretty well, and finally arrived at the International Hotel in Bucharest in the evening. We needed a good rest, as we had no idea what to expect the next day.

The girls at reception could speak English, but were not allowed to give any information to us. I asked what hotels Russian groups were likely to stay at but to no avail. Ah, here I remembered about the cigarettes in my purse, so I offered one pack of Camels to the girl, she smiled and told me the name of the hotel, but no address; another pack was used for that. Encouraged, we started our journey in this unknown city.

The Lonely God Of Faith

The Rebbe paused, and the student noticed a film of salty tears covering the spots of light that guarded the pupils of his teacher's eyes, pupils that served as portals to the Rebbe's inner space.

And within the blackness of those pupils, the student caught a glimpse of the darkness of outer space.

And within that darkness, for the briefest of moments, the student could have sworn that he saw the face of God.

It seemed like an eternity before his next breath proved him wrong.

And the student understood.

Just a tiny glimmer of morning.

all drunken with joy.
Just a small shimmer of hope for the day.

The Shabbos candlelight crashes

Remember me

NORMA BARKIN

I am the face of innocence defiled,
By criminal design a chosen child,
That Satan's messengers condemned to flame,
Before I learned to sing or write my name.

Delivered through their diabolic door,
I was but one. There were a million more.
Then from that well of promise think to mourn
The millions who will ever be unborn.

When history's grim numbers you recall,
Do not forget the saddest count of all,
Each pure and shining heart, each budding mind,
Abandoned by inhuman humankind.

My life unmarked, my story left untold,
Denied the gifts of love and growing old,
Abruptly severed from the world, unblessed,
I cannot sleep.
I was not laid to rest.

A life redeemed

HOWARD KURLANDSKI

Blithely skipping amongst the trees,
A child caresses the morning breeze.
Blissfully enveloping the joys of life
Sheltered from the darkness of ill-fated strife.

These innocent times, I do recall
Of skipping stones and bouncing ball
But then times turn -a child grows to man
Life streaming onward, not according to plan.
An unexpected loss tears out a moanful moan
Sagging under the undulating weight of that groanful groan.

But belief in God gives a second chance
A brand new start, a new romance
I remember the old, but embrace the new
A life reborn, I cannot eschew.
Like slaves in Egypt, brought from darkness to light
Redeemed and salvaged from their perilous plight.
Statuesque, smiling eyes, sweet like a dove
Sustains that innocence of an enduring love.

The Doll

RUTH SHEPS

She tried to shoo me away from the front door, or more to the point, from the 40 below (but dry) air outside. I wouldn't be shooed though. I stuck like an appendage to my mother as she carried the delivery briskly through the spartan, glacial living room and into the toasty kitchen. The return address on the box said that it was mailed by my uncle in Israel on Oct. 28, 1952, which was at that time a wild and lawless frontier where he, my aunt and my cousin ended up. And here it was on our kitchen table in Winnipeg, a mere three months later.

The heavy grey haze of haunting memories and pain that hovered always in our home lifted for the moment, held in suspended animation while anticipation danced in the air.

The box was wrapped in thin brown paper that my mother carefully removed while I waited an eternity, breathless and wide-eyed. Finally the lid came up and away to reveal a hard molded plastic doll. She had moveable arms and legs and her hard molded plastic hair was the same honey brown colour as the rest of her naked body. My mother handed her to me, my first and only doll, and I took her and cradled her in my arms, my mouth frozen in an expression of open amazement.

> My mother handed her to me, my first and only doll

I was stoic about the long, wide crack in her head. After all she had just journeyed from a war zone so I knew she was lucky to be alive at all.

Just as I knew, and could never forget, that my mother and father were lucky to be alive at all. "There, but for the grace of God go I," was a resounding refrain inside my four-year-old head. I was, for one surreal moment, unreservedly thrilled, feeling the happiness of childhood and noticing at the same time the novelty of that feeling, knowing that it didn't belong entirely to me, that just as the doll was a gift to me, my delight was a gift to my mother. She could no more feel her own joy in the wake of her freakish encounter with cruelty than my doll could feel the crack in her head.

I swaddled my doll in blankets and covered her head with a knit cap. When spring arrived I put her in a doll carriage that somehow materialized, wore my best dress with the box pleats, my white Mary Janes with white knee socks, and accessorized tastefully with a satin bow in my hair and trademark Band-Aid on my left knee. How proud I felt parading down Selkirk Avenue pushing my doll in her carriage, she with a cap over her fractured skull and I with a Band-Aid over my imaginary scratch. Together we were the picture of the walking wounded. ■

The post-shabbat clean-up

BARBIE DUKES

In the hot sink her gloved fingers massaged yesterday's cholent pot

while the liturgical music from her youth massaged yesterday's crusted tears.

And the notes arched her back, eyes close splashing fresh tears into the murky water.

Haunting chants chaotic chorus spherical songs ancestral shoresh.

Notes descend deep into pain, transforms, then climbs
now, here, sublime.

Singing soul music, faith soaring spirit integrate.

Creation sings

Dream of Place

watching the demolition of what was a synagogue

DOROTHY GLICK

Seeming unmoved
yet complicit, their fingers locked in grooves of the wire fence surrounding the demolition, they watch their history crushed again into failing memories;
with forced indifference they shrug,
"that's life"

Someone has made a deal.

There are other landmarks to keep.

Every day
tractors with long-necked, thick-toothed heads scavenge the lot, digging and spilling, reckless and hungry to devour any resemblance, any sentiment reduce everything to gravel and sand so that no brick remains or stained glass of sky-high sanctuary windows, not a step or splinter of a door to altar, or reception hall

nothing to linger over, nothing to propel them back to review the immigrant climb they'd journeyed far to settle here.

A certain madness in that shrug again a letting go a dream
a place they had made their own

As families gather around the seder table to share the story of the Exodus – from generation to generation – let us reflect on the journey from slavery to freedom, and celebrate the peace we enjoy and cherish as Canadians.

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and our Parliamentary caucus, my family and I extend our very best wishes on this Passover.

As we came out to the street and started walking to take a bus or taxi, we thought that a time machine threw us back 40 years, so poor, grey and shabby the city looked. We took a bus, that could take us there, but after a short ride, we got off that rattling box. After a very long, difficult walk, after many enquiries, by late afternoon we approached this dungeon-like hotel.

Inside, we asked about the group from Alma-Ata, but again, we got no information. So, another pack of Camels, this magic key, helped us to start the conversation. The receptionist confirmed that the group did arrive. Another Camels helped to open the book with names of the people in the group, but to our horror, the woman said that my sister's name was not there. We were petrified. Did we make a trip for nothing? Was it true she was not there, that she did not arrive? I told my mother that I did not believe the clerk until I saw the book with my own eyes. Using some chutzpah I asked her to show me the list of names, but she refused. Again I had to force her to be nice and show me the list by giving her a double portion of Camels. Finally, she opened the book with names and I saw what I really wanted to see: My sister's name was squeezed in between the lines, most likely added later. Thank God! She was in town and we would see her!

> All of a sudden, another man entered angrily into the room

At that moment an odd man approached us and inquired what we were doing there. So we told him that we wanted to meet somebody from the group. We understood right away he was a KGB agent. He did not allow us to stay in the building, so we waited outside. The group was touring the city and was coming later for dinner.

Some time passed, it became dark, and finally, the tour bus pulled in. People started coming out, we held our breath. Almost at the end, she came out. Yes, it was my sister that we had not seen for over 15 years. I quietly called her by name once, no reaction, then for the second time, and as she turned around and saw us, she smiled in disbelief. She did not immediately grasp that we were standing there for her.

After her dinner she approached us and took us up to her room secretly. First thing we did was to give her all the gifts we had brought her which she hastily hid in her luggage. After hugs and kisses, mixed with happy tears and emotions, we had our lengthy conversation. All of a sudden, another man entered angrily into the room and asked us who we were. My sister naively answered that her mother and sister from Canada came to visit her. You should have seen this raging KGB bull! He started screaming with threats that if he noticed "something", (meaning "suspicious,") he would send her by plane directly to Moscow! We looked at him calmly, with some disdain, but without any confrontation, we worried for my sister. It was getting late and was time for us to leave. We asked her about plans for the next day and left the hotel.

It was pitch dark outside, complete blackout, like during the wartime. No lights, no ads, nothing; just thick, enveloping darkness. We were worried, how would we get back to our hotel now? The taxis were impossible to get, they were all operating only on special orders. My mother and I felt desperate and scared in this forlorn and miserable city. We were standing for a full hour in this thick darkness, two lonely women, at the main intersection, praying to God, that He would help us get safely to our hotel. Not a single human soul was seen on the streets.

All of a sudden, the tall figure of a policeman appeared close to us. I rushed to him with the speed of lightning and explained our situation. We, Canadian tourists, needed to get to our hotel and asked for his help to get us a taxi. He understood my desperate request, took out his walkie-talkie and ordered a special taxi for us, which arrived in two minutes. We were saved, our prayers were answered! It was a miracle! Thank you, God!

Next morning we found out that my sister's group unexpectedly left the city, their stay in Bucharest cut short. We were upset, but were determined to chase them further to Hungary. We bought tickets through a travel agency and flew by Malev Airlines to Budapest. The search was on again, to find the group's location in the new country.

This time it was even harder, because nobody there spoke English, only German or Hungarian. But what a drastic difference it was between the cities! Budapest was nicer, cleaner and richer in every aspect; even the weather was much brighter and put us in a better mood. The city was flooded with Soviet military personnel.

We hired a taxi and started our journey, better to say, adventure, to find my sister there.

The driver was a gentleman, very polite, he spoke no English. We communicated in signs, and simple Russian words for him to understand our request. We paid him with our cigarettes very generously, and he did his best to help us.

> We communicated in signs and simple Russian words

Finally, before evening, we found this remote place where the group was staying. The KGB man of the group was now unconsciously drunk in his room, thanks to some help from my sister's friends. Nobody interfered with our second reunion.

We even stayed overnight in my sister's hotel room until morning. This was our time of brief happiness together. Next day (the officer still drunk), we took a taxi and went sightseeing with her. We took her to the best places, took pictures, dined in the best restaurant in town, with Gypsies playing and singing. She had never seen anything like that. We went shopping, making her happy, buying stuff for the whole family, having a good time.

And then, the next afternoon it was time to say goodbye. We could not complain, our hard work and efforts were all rewarded. We found her, our needle in the haystack. They were leaving by train, so we came to the train station to be with her for the last moment before their departure. Two strong men in leather jackets and caps, typical KGB uniforms, were standing right behind the three of us, closely watching her, just in case she would defect with us. After the whistle, my sister and the men all boarded the train. My mother and I stayed there until it disappeared in the distance.

It was our time to return home, the long transatlantic flight was waiting. We were exhausted and drained emotionally and physically, and ready to go back home, to our family in Canada.

Yes, this Passover week in 1985 was definitely very different from all other weeks in our lives, but it had something in common with the haggadah of Pesach: both had miracles! ■

Last year you sat here in your huge new tallit. It's a traditional white with royal blue and gold stripes. It's big enough for you to envelop our daughters, one under each arm. Last year I sat at the end of our four, happy that my girls had you. Had your love, your kindness, your consideration. So thankful they had a father like you-tender, and caring. I'm grateful I gave them you as a father.

Remember when you finally decided that your old tallit, the one from your bar mitzvah, was too small? It had shrunk over the years gotten shabby, stained with sweat and rust. It traveled at the bottom of your drawer on our boats, never taken out, but there keeping you company. When we moved off the boat I took it out.

"Do you need this?" I said holding it up, ready to toss it in the pile to discard.

"Yes," you said with an edge to your voice, taking it and tucking it in the suitcase. Your Judaism was a private thing all our sailing years. Finding it hard to explain, you kept it to yourself. Not asking me to learn blessings, or prayers.

Last year you couldn't do the sit and stand. You sat while we stood. Today, two congregants appointed with the honour, open the ark at the front of the synagogue. I sigh. One year we did that on Rosh Hashanah, you and me, at the front of the synagogue with 150 people standing before us. You stand tall and proud – a big smile lights your face, a wink at me. We wait while the rabbi takes out each sacred scroll and hands it to a specially appointed someone, to hold and carry around the synagogue. We don't directly touch it, but only with prayer books, then kiss the book, or with the corner of our tallit and then kiss the tallit. Keeping my gaze on the Torah scroll, I do all this from rote, as I've been taught. These things I've learned I cling to now, hoping they may ease my way. By learning this respect, this gratitude, these ancient traditions, maybe my path will be smoothed. When you were beside me I could tread lightly through life, almost float.

Before you weakened, you held the Torah up, like a feather. High above your head, its weight nothing to you. Opened so the letters could be seen, each letter holy, ancient, mystical. The synagogue made me feel welcome – loved, tolerated, accepted. God was like the parent I never had. When you first got sick, even while you were in the hospital, my heart sank with fear. Will I still be Jewish when you're gone? I even ask our rabbi.

"Of course you will," he said. "We've got you now. It's not so easy to get rid of us." With you gone it feels like you took that with you – that unconditional love, that acceptance, that sense of being seen. So much of me and how I see myself is because of you. With you gone do I feel Jewish? Will I be able to keep feeling it inside?

Today the Torahs shine at the front of the shul in their white holiday covers, dressed in their silver adornments for the high holy days. Atop one rests a big silver ball covered in tiny silver bells swinging and tinkling. Two silver globes poise on tall silver pokers on another. All are polished and ready for the grand opening.

Closing my eyes I let the service and music wash over me. I hold onto Ariel's hand and hope it can tether me to the world, like I once tethered her. At 15 months we took her out on our sailboat from Cape Town across the South Atlantic. I held tight to her little safety harness then. Then I feared sinking and getting into a life raft with a baby, where dark blue waves stretched endlessly out around us. Now in shul I hold her hand and I fly out with you over those undulating mountains up and down. I soar like the wide wing spanned albatross we saw out there, huge wings gliding, riding the air currents inches from the water, just skimming. Sailing again, it's peaceful. Inside my head I'm free, like you were at the end, lost in your daydreams.

Genesis, the story of creation, is read, words that speak to me – of my journey with you. "...and there was darkness upon the face of the deep, and the spirit of God moved over the surface of the waters ...and there was light. ... let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate day from night, they shall serve as signs for the set times – the days and the years....which the waters brought forth in swarms: and the winged birds of every kind.... Let us make a being in our image after our likeness...resting on the seventh day."

I draw the words in, to comfort and distract me from my loneliness, my separateness. Remember how we rounded the breakwater from the harbour at Virgin Gorda, made the cut through the reef, and headed into the wind? How we left land and the world behind. Each time we left shelter I felt a surge of pride and strength and courage. Each time you and I bonded more tightly. You at the helm coiling lines, me at the mast raising the main sail. You fall off the wind, let it catch the sails and push us away and out beyond, gliding up and over the waves to North Sound. We round the black cliffs of St. Helena in the South Atlantic, sail through the oil rigs off Galveston during a solar eclipse, make landfall in a Bequia palm-lined bay on Valentine's Day. I share those memories with only you. Of pelicans gliding silent above dark waves, of a giant fuchsia Portuguese man-o-war sailing deadly beside us, of your big hand gripping both the tiller and me, steady, firm, right.

The cantor starts to sing the Mi Sheberach- the prayer for healing. I love this song and try to sing, but choke on each word. I remember all the times in the last 18-and-a-half months that I begged for you to get better. Our rabbi stood over your white turbaned head, and tubed face in the neuro-ICU. Machines hum in the dimness of the in between world of life and death. Months later he came to our house and sang it with you and the girls sitting around your hospital bed. He laid tfillin with you, the small black leather boxes. I found them in your mom's old vanity case, with her opera glasses, pill boxes, your swim awards, her award in 1938 for elocution.

"These are really old," the rabbi says as he takes the covers off the tfillin. You can't tell us if they were yours or your dad's that memory is lost in the folds of the tumour. He gently unwraps the worn and cracked straps and then rests the box on your forehead. Carefully he adjusts the straps behind your head and down over your Superman T-shirt. You can't get out of bed now and we do all your care in bed, feeding, washing, kissing, dancing, listening to Psychedelic Sunday and now laying tfillin. He wraps the other tfillin around your arm seven times and explains why, and recites the blessing with you. Your lips move in time connecting to an ancient world, your world. I know you did this every day at your Jewish day school in Joburg.

"Boy, Syd you really look Jewish," he jokes sitting beside you on the bed. I smile, but tears pour down my face. I wipe them away, but they keep coming.

Now in shul I keep my eyes open and focused ahead on nothing. A tear runs cold down my cheek. I don't move. My throat constricts. I hope no one will see. We couldn't save you even for one more year to sit with us now. Your whisper is around my shoulders like a warm shawl. I'm comforted by our buried love, by love dead and decomposing, turning its rotting beauty into a permanent mantle for me. I'll take it forward from this day. Bask in the splendour of my glittering faith. I don't want to create a new world without you, an after the apocalypse world. My whole life shines through this sheen of tears, of sorrow, of pain. They say there's a kind of wisdom born of this loss. My heart is broken, but the healing heaviness of you pulls me gently upright and forward. ■

A SNIP THAT COULD SAVE LIVES AND AN INNOVATION THAT COULD SAVE TIME

Not a surprise to us

A Université de Montréal study has shown a lower risk of prostate cancer among circumcised men, especially those who underwent the procedure as adults. The most striking of the results, published in the British Journal of Urology International, is that men circumcised after age 35 were 45 per cent less likely to later develop prostate cancer than men with intact foreskins. The protective effect of circumcision was most pronounced among black men, of whom there were 178 in the study of 2,114. Their risk was cut by 60 per cent. The researchers say they don't know why circumcision may protect against cancer, although they think it may be related to the already documented lower risk of sexually transmitted infection. They also cautioned the findings must be confirmed by more studies. Will this latest snippet of research quiet anti-circumcision activists? Don't count on it.

Iconic food maker sold

The Manischewitz Company, well known for its sweet Kiddush wine and wide variety of Passover foods, was sold a week before the holiday. Sankaty Advisors, an arm of the private equity firm Bain Capital – Mitt Romney's former employer – purchased the Newark, N.J.-based purveyor of kosher foods for an undisclosed price. In addition to its flagship brand, it also markets food under the Rokeach, Mishpacha, Season, Guiltless Gourmet and other banners. Under its new owner, Manischewitz, which was founded in Cincinnati in 1888 as a matzah maker, is expected to promote kosher as an indication of quality food rather than just a religious designation.

Just try to boycott this!

Israeli tech startup StoreDot introduced a boycott-proof concept at Microsoft's Think Next symposium in Tel Aviv last week: a device that can recharge your cellphone in less than 30 seconds. The device is years away from stores – 2016 is the projected date – but the company showed off a prototype that recharged a Samsung S4 with a completely dead battery. It's yet another Israeli breakthrough that even BDSers will be unable to live without. ■

Lessons from the election

As a native Montrealer who returned to this wonderful city after a 29-year absence, I strongly urge the leadership of Jewish Montreal to build on Quebec's election results and not just exhale a sigh of relief.

The results of this pivotal vote must not be taken for granted. Montreal's Jewish population may well continue to lose individuals and families. A Liberal win, no matter its size, just buys time to get out.

Recall Quebec premier Robert Bourassa's ride to victory with a Liberal majority in 1985, only to see subsequent Parti Québécois victories. The nature of politics being what it is, no one party provincially or federally, is re-elected in perpetuity. Voters get tired, they get upset, and human nature being what it is, they eventually opt for change.

My advice to those in the leadership of Jewish Montreal: building on the current Liberal win means focusing on helping people, no matter their age and vocation, get jobs and stay to build a life here.

It means also making every person count, in what he or she can contribute through their time and expertise, to Jewish communal life. It also means being open to new ideas and fresh faces. Because there's an old saying in Yiddish that translates: "If you don't want it, you don't need it."

Passover and the election

Just as Passover teaches us to cherish our freedom and not be slaves to our impulses, so, too, does it teach us to respect other people's rights to their freedom, including the right to wear religious headgear in the workplace. In their attempt to control other people, the Parti Québécois encroached on this right and exercised a form of enslavement.

This Pesach, Jews in Quebec can breathe a sigh of relief and truly celebrate zman cheruteinu, the time of our freedom from tyranny and religious oppression!

Pollard held hostage

It is obscene that the release of Jonathan Pollard is being made conditional on Israel releasing 400 convicted Muslim terrorists.

Pollard's incarceration is a blight on the American system of justice, and abuses every fundamental principle of justice and precedent.

Some years ago I was retained by Pollard as his Canadian counsel. On his behalf, I spoke to many synagogues urging that his sentence for supplying secret information to an ally was even more stringent than those sentences meted out for American citizens who gave secret information to enemies.

One of the shocking aspects of the Pollard trial, one that has not received the publicity that it should have, is that there had been a plea bargain arranged between the government and Pollard and his first wife.

Subsequently, and quite improperly, then-U.S. secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger sent a note to the trial judge urging that Pollard be dealt with in the harshest possible terms. Such actions in Canada by a member of the government would have resulted in an immediate acquittal and firing of the official in question.

That, of course, never happened.

At a convention of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists in Israel, I introduced a resolution condemning the American judicial system with respect to this particular case, with regard to the harshness of the sentence, the flawed judicial process and the fact that there would be no way that Pollard would have any further worthwhile secret information to reveal upon his release.

By every legal standard Pollard should have been released years ago.

Once again, the Palestinians are extracting a concession from Israel to extend the futile Middle East peace talks and giving nothing in return.

RABBI-2-RABBI

How do today's shuls judge success?

More young families are coming through the doors, but attendance still isn't what it used be in the good old days. That just might be a good thing.

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheier: When I first came to the Shaar Hashomayim community 10 years ago, I was given two challenges: Change nothing, and change everything. Over the past number of years, we've focused on engaging a group we call "young families." This group includes children, parents and young adults. The YF events are typically fun, energetic and catered to various segments within this particular demographic. I wonder whether you've focused your efforts on this group, and how you would measure success with this kind of outreach?

Rabbi Cutler: In my five years at Beth Tzedec, we have indeed placed a growing emphasis on youth and young families. We have certainly noted increased attendance at young-family-focused programs. However, counting the number of Jews through our doors does not by itself indicate success.

We will have succeeded if, after a program, those who attended tell us that the content had an impact on their lives, and if they convince their friends to join them the next time. But we can't expect the dividends to begin paying out for a very long time.

Rabbi Scheier: I think the long view is the right view, but we don't have time on our side. When I first interviewed for the rabbi position at my congregation, the interview took place on "Youth Shabbat," which was (and continues to be) an energetic weekend when the synagogue was filled with young people. I – optimistically and innocently – asked one of my hosts, "Is it like this every week?" He wisely replied, "It could be."

Once I arrived to serve as rabbi, I realized that we were far from this dream. On each Shabbat morning, there was exactly one stroller parked outside the sanctuary. Ten years later, there are many, many more strollers and children.

I think an essential part of my job is convincing my community that we still believe that "it could be." And while our success might be measured over a long period of time, we have to move forward with a sense of urgency.

Rabbi Cutler: It's wonderful to read about your successes in Montreal. I am also glad to read of your sense of urgency. However, I don't see preserving the Jewish future as a goal unto itself. Judaism doesn't exist so that Judaism can continue to exist. Our religion is here to guide our lives today, helping us to build a relationship with things that are beyond ourselves. Our youth activities need to focus on how our rich tradition benefits the lives of its adherents. We will be successful if those in our spheres of influence find Jewish practice to be meaningful, relevant and uplifting.

I frequently walk by a picture of our cavernous sanctuary filled with what appears to be more than 1,000 congregational school students. We forget, though, that Hebrew school for many children was an abysmal experience. We remember the grand oratory of rabbis past, but forget that congregants were rarely challenged to think for themselves. Our past has a vote, but not a veto.

Rabbi Scheier: So, maybe, there's the rub: on the one hand, we have the nostalgic synagogue, brimming with congregants who are not being intellectually challenged and Hebrew schools that are full, yet fail when it comes to fulfilling their mandate to educate and inspire. On the other hand, we have the modern congregation that provides an emotionally stimulating and intellectually challenging experience for the select few who show up, and Hebrew schools that struggle to attract students, but thoroughly inspire those who do attend. And the difference between the two is that, due to a larger membership size, the former is able to pay its bills, while the latter struggles.

Of course, neither depiction is accurate, nor is history ever so simple. The thing about nostalgia is that you can never achieve what they achieved, nor are our challenges as difficult as theirs were. Nostalgia, in the same breath, can enrich and distract.

Rabbi Cutler: Tinted perhaps with rose-coloured glasses, we can certainly picture our synagogues' pasts. What, though, of their future? Wouldn't it be marvelous if our buildings lined their hallways not with images of times past, but of our best wishes for the future? ■

Every winter, we like to go down south. Who needs the cold at our age? Last year, we signed up for the Benjamin's Funeral Service Listings email. Beginning the healing process

We Canadian Jews come in all sorts of political stripes. Take, for example, Michael Taube and Adam Goldenberg, two of The CJN's new columnists making their inaugural appearances in their roles on page 11 of this week's newspaper.

Goldenberg, a former Liberal speechwriter, argues Conservative partisans in this country have been manoeuvring during the last decade to make Israel a wedge issue in order to win Jewish votes. Meanwhile, Taube, a former speechwriter for Prime Minister Stephen Harper, claims that Jews and Tories share mutual ground far beyond Israel. "Jewish values and Tory values have a great deal in common," he writes, "and this important relationship will only continue to get stronger."

Most of us accept that there's not much point trying to distill the Jewish community's position on specific points of political interest. It's simply not possible – and that's not a bad thing, so long as we respect each others' right to hold opinions different from our own. I would argue the community as a whole benefits specifically because it can accommodate so many disparate political and social views.

Nevertheless, all of Canadian Jewry – or at least as close to it as you're ever going to get – would probably agree that Phillipe Couillard and the Liberal Party's recent triumph in Quebec's provincial election was a tremendous victory for the Jewish community.

Armed with a majority government, Couillard, hopefully, will follow through on his election promises to fix Quebec's economy, create jobs and reduce the deficit. That is where the Liberal government should focus its attention, not the two political hot potatoes the previous Parti Québécois government obsessed over: separation from Canada and the shameful charter of Quebec values. If Couillard merely steers the conversation away from those avenues, it will be a good start.

Quebec's Jews – and, really, all religious people in the province – can breath a sigh of relief after a tense campaign that just a few weeks ago appeared to be heading toward a very different outcome. They no longer have to worry about the prospect of picking up their families and moving away, a very real possibility for many had the PQ and now-ex-leader Pauline Marois improved on their minority government. Nor do they have to fear discrimination in the workplace because they choose to wear a kippah. Their province has soundly rejected the PQ and Marois' politics of division and xenophobia.

Couillard's victory – Marois' defeat – was celebrated beyond the borders of Quebec, too. For Jews who live in the ROC (rest of Canada) – and the ROC in general – the election result felt like a critical affirmation of religious rights across this country. The notion that under a PQ government some Quebecers might not be allowed to express themselves religiously by law left so many of us chilled, wondering whether there truly was a future for Quebec's nearly 250-year-old Jewish community.

This campaign and the 19 months preceding it during which Marois and the PQ ruled was a scary period, for Quebec and for Canada. It will take time for the fear to fully dissipate. The good news is Quebec voters have declared that the healing process may now begin. ■ — YONI

PERSONAL HISTORY

The return of the Robinsons

Gerald Posner

It's a fact that many westerners, particularly Winnipeggers, have over the years made their way to a new life in Toronto.

Most of them came on their own initiative or because some relative was living there. But, in the case of Shayne, Brenlee and Hart Robinson, their move to Toronto rekindled a spark begun long ago by their great-great-grandfather.

The Robinson saga started in 1840 when Nathan Reubenson, as he was known then, was born in what was Russian Poland. Reubenson's legacy continues to this day in the form of a significant chain of his descendants who have returned to Toronto after a long time away.

Not so surprisingly, Nathan received a very Jewish education, given that his father was the dayan (judge) of the town, Kalwarya, where he lived. In 1877, Nathan Reubenson came to Toronto to accept a position connected to the pulpit at what was then B'nei Shalom Congregation, later to be amalgamated with Holy Blossom Temple. At the time, there were all of 100 Jews in Toronto. That fact led to Reubenson taking on the roles of shochet, mohel and chazzan. Throughout his 22 years in Toronto, he was devoted to the synagogue. He was married at a young age and had many children, one of whom was R. S. Robinson, who began the next phase of the Robinson story.

R.S. – R for Reuben and S for Simon –, was born in Russia in 1864 and educated not only in a religious way, but also in business in Toronto. But then he made a left turn and traded his tfillin in for snow shoes and settled for six years in Wabigoon, Ont., where he acted as inland revenue commissioner, license commissioner and school trustee. But in 1903, R. S. moved to Winnipeg and began a business that still operates to this day although under a different name. That first business was R. S. Robinson and Sons Ltd., which was owned and operated by R.S. and his five sons. He was the first parnas of the Shaarey Shomayim Synagogue and was instrumental in the establishment of the Esther Robinson Jewish Orphanage Children's Aid Society of Western Canada named for his mother. He was president of the Winnipeg Hebrew Free School. To put it mildly, R.S. was a mover and a shaker in Winnipeg, both in the Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

The Robinson family circa 1910.
1. Ruth (married name Leberg)
2. Bessie (maiden name Sugarman)
3. Hattie (died at 31)
4. Sydney Isaac
5. Percy (Percival)
6. Wilbur
7. Reuben Simon
8. Dora (married name Cohen)
9. Nate (Nathan)
10. Fanny (married name Goldstine)
11. Ralph

One of his five sons, Sydney Isaac Robinson, took the family to an even higher level. S.I. took over the business from his father and improved it. It became S. I. Robinson Furs, later Sydney I. Robinson Sporting Goods, then S.I. Robinson Sporting Goods and finally SIR Sporting Goods. It was the name SIR Furs that became a landmark in Winnipeg, with a big billboard sign showing a large black bear facing Portage Avenue. S.I. ran the business until his stroke in 1978 and subsequent death in 1980.

S.I.'s son Earl changed the direction of the family by heading into sporting goods. SIR Sporting Goods was the leader in the field, and people from all over Western Canada patronized the store. Earl operated the business until he sold it to the large U.S. chain Cabella's just a few years ago.

Yet another son of Sydney I., Myles Robinson, led the family in an entirely new direction as he became one of Canada's first developers of shopping centres and subdivisions, something he did in relative anonymity. The only daughter of S.I. Robinson was Gloria, who settled in Toronto and in a rather coincidental way, in terms of names, married the late Justice Sydney L. Robins formerly of the Ontario Court of Appeal.

In the last few years, the Robinson family has come full circle, as three of Myles Robinson's four children returned to Toronto, from whence their original ancestor, Nathan, came. In doing so, the children, now adults, have in their own way added to the family story, yet they have also continued aspects of the family history and tradition.

Thus, son Shayne, now married and the father of two new Robinsons, moved back to Toronto from Winnipeg in 2007. He has followed his great-great-grandfather, Nathan, in terms of his involvement in the synagogue world by his very significant role in the First Narayver Congregation (located not far from the original B'nei Shalom shul that his ancestor was active in so long ago) as chairman of its social action committee. Brother Hart Robinson is a freelance programmer/analyst.

Their sister, Brenlee Robinson, has followed her great-grandfather Reuben by being a leader in promoting an outdoor style of life. She's a past president of the Mosaic Outdoor Clubs of America and a vice-president of the Ontario Urban Forest Council for four years. She's currently a consultant and educator in urban forestry.

It's been almost 140 years since Nathan Reubenson arrived in Toronto to make his mark. He would surely derive satisfaction from knowing his descendants are back in the city and following his religious bent while at the same time pursuing the interests of his son Reuben. ■

What makes a film Jewish?

On the eve of The Toronto Jewish Film Festival, opening May 1, we asked five experts this all-important question

ALLEN BRAUDE

TJFF programmer

Most of the films I preview for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) have obvious Jewish content. Occasionally a film will come along in which no character or documentary subject ever identifies as Jewish, yet I find the film to be very Jewish. If asked why, I'd say that such films have a Jewish "sensibility."

Nu, what's a Jewish sensibility? Drawing from the examples of such films in this year's festival I'd say they are films about characters that seem to not quite fit in and feature humour that is self-deprecating – they are films that bring the characters' neuroses to the forefront, and put more emphasis on talk than on action.

Does this sound stereotypical? Perhaps it is, and I would add that it is influenced by my experience both as a minority and as someone who connects culturally to being Jewish rather than through religion.

Is sensibility exclusive to the Diaspora experience? The Israeli film A Strange Course of Events suggests that might not be the case. In this subtle and slyly humorous, film, 40-something Shaul doesn't seem to fit in anywhere, and isn't happy about it. He blames his problems on the father he hasn't seen in five years and decides to confront him, only to find his father a changed man.

To me, the film clearly shares the Jewish sensibility I've described. It turns out, however, that director Raphaël Nadjari grew up in France. Whether or not this Jewish sensibility is only found in films from the Diaspora, my feeling is that enough people recognize it to allow films without overt Jewish content to still be very Jewish.

Although Margaret was not by a Jewish filmmaker, the film about a young Jewish girl, played by Anna Paquin, whose moral courage is tested, is very much a Jewish film.

KEVIN COURRIER

Editor-in-chief of Critics at Large

Perhaps the easiest way to answer what constitutes a Jewish film is to say it should take the viewer inside the world and values of Judaism. It should also express some aspect of the sensibility of being Jewish.

For me, as a non-Jew, Eytan Fox's Walk on Water was like acquiring a passport into Israeli culture. But you don't have to be Jewish to make a Jewish film. Kenneth Lonergan proved that recently with Margaret, a movie about a young Jewish girl whose moral courage is tested when she has to face up to her role in a fatal accident.

However, being Jewish doesn't mean you're always making a Jewish film. (William Wyler was certainly Jewish. But does that make Wuthering Heights a Jewish film?) On the other hand, the Coen Brothers are Jewish and A Serious Man is soaked in Judaism, but their tone is so churlish and judgmental toward its characters that it seems to betray the need to even raise questions so germane to Judaism.

The Big Lebowski, on the other hand, has only one Jewish character (and he converted), but the Coens turn the detective novel into the perfect Jewish parable about the unknowability of truth. There's no question that Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List is a Jewish film, but how come nobody thinks of Jaws as the Jewish Moby Dick?

PHYLLIS ANGEL GREENBERG

TJFF board member

Is there an empirical definition of a "Jewish" film? Certainly it is not enough to have a Jewish writer and/or director/producer/actor, or even a character, for if that were the case, then almost every Hollywood film would fall into the category.

So what makes a film Jewish? A Jewish perspective? Jewish subject matter? A Jewish setting? Yes, but sometimes there are intangibles that lead us to label a film "Jewish" or of particular interest to a Jewish audience.

In a "Jewish" film, the "Jewish-ness" should be self-conscious and not by chance. Also, the film must be of specific Jewish interest. Holocaust films, whether or not they are about Jews, would likely always qualify. Documentaries are more easily categorized as Jewish because the subject matter is clear: anything to do with Judaism – for example, the history of Jews in Italy, the first female ordained rabbi, the influence of Jewish merchants in Leeds, the life of Marc Chagall, comedians in the Catskills, anti-Semitism – and the list can and does go on and on. If the topic of the film is Jewish, the filmmakers need not be Jewish for the film to fit the bill.

(A documentary submitted last year is an interesting and disturbing analysis of miscegenation laws in Virginia. Sadly, the only Jewish element in the film is that one of the lawyers' last name is "Cohen." Not enough! A peripheral Jewish character does not make a film "Jewish.")

That first Passover

REGINA BRETT
JNS.ORG

That first Passover was a tough one. I had been dating a Jewish man for the first time and he invited me to celebrate Passover with some friends. He didn't warn me about the four cups of wine. (I don't drink). He didn't tell me about the meat. (I'm a vegetarian.) He didn't tell me what to wear. (I'm fashion impaired.) So I showed up wearing a sporty red, white and blue dress that was probably a few inches too short and a few shades too red.

I would have stood out anyway. The name Regina is like a brand that you're Catholic. I was clueless about Jewish traditions – and Jewish geography doesn't extend too deeply into counties Clare and Mayo where my dad's parents came from in Ireland.

I gave up on blending in at the seder the minute I walked in the door. Before my boyfriend could introduce me, the host shouted with glee from across the room, "A goy!" then rushed over to welcome me. That was the first time I met philanthropist Lee Seidman, whose joy for all things Jewish became contagious and got me hooked for life. That Passover night I became Jew-"ish."

As a Catholic in a small town, I was rarely exposed to anyone Jewish. The only thing my parents said about Jews is that they were still waiting for the Messiah, as if they had missed some spiritual bus we had climbed onto. In Catholic school, when we collectively played the part of the Jewish crowd on Good Friday chanting, "Crucify him!" we didn't know it was anti-Semitic. We believed God chose for Jesus to die on a cross for our salvation.

My parents never said anything negative about anyone Jewish, but they didn't teach us anything about Jews or Judaism and all the rich rituals and traditions and endless holidays that seem to occur every third day of the year.

Most gentiles I know (yes, I've adopted that word over the years) are clueless about anything Jewish except for Seinfeld reruns and Stephen Sondheim lyrics.

So I stumbled through my first seder, and I soon felt like family. As soon as they started the service, my heart relaxed. I knew the story from Exodus about how Moses led the people from the bondage to freedom. This was my life story, too. This was my past, too. Exodus. Deuteronomy. Isaiah. It was all familiar, except for the matzah, charoset and gefilte fish, which doesn't even resemble a fish.

Passover taught me to re-view the past, to see it all through the eyes of gratitude, framed by that powerful word Dayeinu – it would have been enough for us. If God had only brought us out of Egypt, it would have been enough. If God had just parted the sea for us, it would have been enough. But God kept – and keeps on – giving.

As I listened to the history of the Jews, I heard my own history in a new light. If God had only given me my daughter, it would have been enough. If God had just bestowed on me good health, it would have been enough.

I ended up marrying the boyfriend who took me to my first Passover seder. God ended up giving me a Jewish husband, who came with two wonderful sons, three amazing siblings and more Jewish friends than I can count.

That first Passover pulled me into a new world, one that now feels like home. ■

Lies, distortions and the world's oldest hatred

Gil Troy

The McGill Daily has long been the Pravda of Montreal, as totalitarian and surreal as the Communist propaganda sheet that masqueraded as the Soviet Union's newspaper. In general, I don't respond to anything published there. As a student daily its commentaries should be rebutted by other students, not professors.

Still, a friend recently forwarded a McGill Daily article trying to justify an academic boycott against Israel – which makes as much sense as pilots boycotting jet fuel. The article's opening lines provide what we in the education business call a teachable moment. "Israel is a colonial settler state," the article began. "This is very hard to contest, regardless of the history – religious or secular – of the Zionist movement."

I wish I could quote the two lines, chuckle and feel confident that all honest people, Jewish or not, would join me in laughing at (and crying about) the many lies and distortions embedded in those 23 words. But shame on most of us for not being able to defend truth, democracy, and yes, the Jewish State more effectively. Given this collective failure, allow me to zero in on the four major assaults on truth provided, suggesting a rather efficient A-IDR – an anti-Israel duplicity rate – of one warping whopper per 5.75 words.

Start with "colonialism." Wikipedia defines colonialism as "the establishment, exploitation, maintenance, acquisition, and expansion of colonies in one territory by people from another territory" (emphasis added), what one historian calls "foreign invaders" from "a distant metropolis." For this definition to apply to Israel, the Jews would have to have no rights, no history, no presence and no standing in this contested territory – which is not true regarding Israel or its overlapping West Bank neighbour, where borders have shifted repeatedly, although the allegation is central to the Palestinian claim. This Palestinian negation explains the demand for recognition of Israel as a Jewish state.

The word "settler" is more accurate but still mischievous. A settler is simply "a person who settles in an area." But the term has become loaded, with Palestinians using it to mean foreign interloper. Ironically, Wikipedia's first definition says settlers "typically" settle "in an area… with no or few previous inhabitants." We, equally mischievously, could claim that every time Palestinians call Jews settlers, they are de-legitimizing themselves, emphasizing how much open, undeveloped land there is in the West Bank – which is where most new towns sprouted up and where most Jewish "settlers" settled.

The third lie is epistemological, related to the theory of knowledge. The writer claims the proposition is "very hard to contest." In my first college seminar, the professor raised a book and challenged us to offer an opinion, a principle, a belief, let alone a historical or ideological conclusion that was as true as the fact that once the professor dropped the book, it would fall. Historical judgments can't compare in authority to the laws of gravity – and I admit that as a professional historian.

Finally, the author pulls an old debater's trick, saying "regardless of the history – religious or secular – of the Zionist movement." This implies that no matter how we settle that debate, it reinforces his point. But besides emphasizing that Israel's ties to the land are religious and secular, thus not colonial, the debate over Zionism's character is irrelevant. However you slice it, Jews have a stake in the area. We are not outsiders.

Academics usually take professional pride in unmasking simplistic slogans, sloppy definitions, bogus postures and false choices. That campuses are becoming centres for concocting these big lies about Israel being colonialist, racist and imperialist is a triple betrayal. It betrays academics' mission to embrace truth in all its complexity. It betrays educators' moral obligation to be honest and accurate. And it personally betrays people like me, who have dedicated our lives to academic ideals, only to see them trashed in the pile-on against Israel.

When the hatred of something is so great that people sacrifice core values, defining characteristics, foundational principles and professional standards, we plunge from the rational into the psychopathological. When that descent involves Jews, we have a term to describe it: not "just" anti-Zionism, today's trendiest hatred, but anti-Semitism, the world's oldest hatred. ■

What are your 100 essential Jewish books?

Sara Horowitz

During a festival that celebrates the freedom and spiritual redemption of the Jewish People, how can we not add a compelling fifth question: what is the future of Jewish peoplehood? In an era characterized by rapid social change, we wonder what the Jewish world will look like in 100 years. Will we transmit our traditions down to later generations?

Surveys and other vehicles of measurement focus on such things as institutional affiliation, neighbourhoods, dating choices and schooling – all valid factors. Alarm bells sound – we're losing ground. Perhaps. But it's worth remembering that as a people and a culture, Jews have experienced cataclysmic sea changes, morphing, adapting, redefining and at the same time retaining something solid at the core.

It's hard for most of us to look at Jewish history without imprinting our own experience on it. Religiously observant post-biblical Jews, for example, impose the laws of kashrut on our forefathers and foremothers, place a tallit on Abraham's shoulder's while he binds his son on the altar and credit Jacob with composing the Minchah (afternoon) service. Some socially conservative students imagine their long-ago Eastern European Jewish great-great-etc. grandmothers as stay-at-home-moms, leaving the breadwinning to their spouses. They model this imagined arrangement on 20th-century bourgeois families, not the realities of shtetl life, where stay-at-home and working were synonymous, not mutually exclusive.

What Jews are and how Jews live changes over time. At the same time, there must be some constants if Jewishness is not to fade into non-existence. One subtext of the currently airing BBC series The Story of the Jews is a meditation on what comprises those necessary constants. The series is narrated and conceptualized by Simon Schama, a gifted British historian . A London-born Jew of Ashkenazi and Sephardi family background, Schama makes his point verbally and visually. The Torah – by which he means the text and scroll – unites Jews worldwide and through time, and has done so since Sinai. But Schama doesn't mean only the Torah. Again and again, he points to the Torah as the origin of a tradition of transmitting stories – stories about the Jewish past, but also stories that reflect the Jewish present, that impart Jewish meaning, stories that may begin orally, but eventually find their way into Jewish texts.

Consider this a call for a commitment to Jewish texts, to reading Jewish books. In a PhD program, it's not uncommon to ask students to create and master a list of 100 books in his or her field. If Jewishness, Judaica, or Judaism were the field, what books would you put on it? Which would provide sufficient familiarity with Jewish history, stories and ways of being, to enable the reader to think with Jewish ethics in mind about the complicated issues that surround our lives.

Different folks, different lists. The first few choices would be simple. Then it would get interesting. My guess is there would be areas of great overlap and significant areas of difference. For many, they would blur the line between religious and secular, perhaps reading sacred texts through a secular lens or discerning the sacred in a secular text.

I'm not suggesting a Jewish canon . In fact, I'm suggesting just the opposite – an anti-canon, if you like. The very act of compiling a list is enfolded in deciding what sort of Jewish life and Jewish community you envision for yourself, what sort of Jewish commitments are close to your heart, how you wish to nurture a Jewish ethic and what life issues demand a Jewish lens.

One hundred is a daunting number if we think about reading the books in a compressed period of time, as doctoral students do. But what if there's no time limit? Just begin, take as long as necessary, digest, think and go on to the next. Read with a partner, a group, a teacher or solo.

The signature exercise in Pilates is called doing the hundreds. A simple form to master, it does wonders to strengthen the core. Want to strengthen the Jewish core? Let's do the Jewish hundred. ■

OPINION

The Israel trap

Adam Goldenberg

As a Liberal staffer during the 2008 federal election, I often received incredulous emails from Jewish friends who wondered how I could possibly be trying to defeat Stephen Harper, a prime minister who was such an adamant supporter of Israel. When I worked for Michael Ignatieff, I was treated to regular pronouncements that my boss was an anti-Semite.

Too often, I'd take the bait. "Harper didn't change Canada's voting record at the United Nations. Paul Martin did!" I'd protest. "The Conservatives haven't actually changed the content of Canada's Middle East policy since they took office!"

For non-Conservative Jews, this is the Israel trap: the temptation to argue endlessly about the Jewish state with friends for whom it is the single most important subject in Canadian politics. By playing their game, we've all been complicit in turning Canadian Jews into single-issue voters for the first time in our community's history.

This hasn't happened by accident. It used to be that, as a community, our political priorities were distinctly multifaceted. Irwin Cotler and Canadian Jewish Congress helped to craft the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. David Lewis and Dave Barrett were powerful voices in social democratic politics. In Ontario, Eddie Goodman led the "Big Blue Machine" through decades of Progressive Conservative rule.

Jews who voted Conservative used to do so because they were true conservatives – because they shared the party's views on the economy, the environment and health care. Many of these partisans have spent the past decade trying to persuade the rest of us to join them, and they've used Israel as a wedge to win Jewish votes. It's worked. Exit polls after the 2011 federal election indicated 52 per cent of Jewish voters marked their ballots for a Tory candidate.

In the United States, Jewish Republicans have tried to replicate their Canadian cousins' success, to no avail. Nearly 70 per cent of American Jews voted to re-elect President Barack Obama in 2012, despite a multimillion-dollar effort – led by billionaire casino magnate Sheldon Adelson and groups such as the Republican Jewish Coalition – to paint the Democrats as insufficiently hawkish in their support of Israel. In a 2013 poll by the American Jewish Committee, 52 per cent of American Jews identified as Democrats, and just 15 per cent as Republicans. A 2012 poll by the same organization, identified the economy, not Israel, as the most important election issue for Jewish voters by a wide margin.

It could be that, as conservatives go, our Tories are simply less menacing than their Republicans, so Canadian Jews who are politically moderate might be more willing to support right-wing politicians in Canada than they would be in the United States. But to explain a phenomenon is not to deny it. Anyone who has discussed politics at a seder table in the past decade will confirm that Canadian Jews who vote Conservative are likely to do so because of one issue more than any other: Israel.

Of course, not every Jew who votes Tory does so solely, or even primarily, because of the prime minister's pro-Israel rhetoric. But the manner in which our community interacts with our country's politics has unquestionably changed. Party operatives of every stripe have come to think of Jews as single-issue voters, and our community's elites seem keen to prove them right.

Look no further than Canadian Jewish Congress. For more than 90 years, its advocacy focused as much on human rights at home and abroad as on the Middle East. When it disappeared in 2011, the leaders of the organization that replaced it dropped Canada from its new name, the "Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs." Canada's most prominent Jewish organization now refers to just one country – and it isn't ours.

This Passover, Harper will undoubtedly be praised from shul pulpits across Canada, and not just by the 21 rabbis he brought to Israel. Between now and the 2015 election, you'll likely see the photo of the prime minister at the Kotel – which Tory MP Mark Adler infamously described as "the million-dollar shot" – in campaign leaflets and ads. The panoply of political concerns that once defined the Jewish community will continue to fade into the background.

No one forced Canadian Jews into the Israel trap, and no politician can keep us there. But if we don't want our leaders to see us as single-issue voters, it's time we stopped acting that way. ■

Canadian Jews will remain in the Tory camp

Michael Taube

Stephen Harper became Canada's 22nd prime minister in February 2006. Since that time, he has worked extremely hard to build stronger ties between the Conservative Party and Canada's Jewish community.

To Harper's credit, his efforts have been quite successful. An Ipsos-Reid exit poll noted that 52 per cent of Canadian Jews voted for the Tories in the 2011 federal election. While a higher number would have been more desirable, it's a start in the right direction.

Many left-wing Jews have tried to dismiss these important Tory gains as a short-term political phenomenon. "It's all because of Harper's pro-Israel stance," some have said. "The Jewish community doesn't believe in the right-wing political and economic ideas that the Tories espouse," argue others. "In time, they'll all go back to their natural political homes and vote either Liberal or NDP," a few triumphantly proclaim.

A fascinating analysis, to be sure. If I may borrow a line from William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, "Lord, what fools these mortals be!"

All kidding aside, it's easy to understand the left's terse reaction. In my view, the political tide has turned in Canada – not temporarily, but permanently. Historic political allegiances and perceived voting behaviour are things of the past. In their place, Canadian Jews (especially younger ones) now understand the Tories aren't the political bogeymen the older generation once feared and resisted. They realize that Jewish values and Tory values have a great deal in common, and this important relationship will only continue to get stronger.

It's true that some Canadian Jews supported Harper and the Tories due to their strong defence of Israel. They would be regarded as single-issue voters, something that all political parties have to deal with during election cycles. Many of these individuals cannot be counted on for long-term support, but some will seek out a better understanding of Tory policies and principles. In time, they may like what they see.

Meanwhile, Harper and the Tories aren't advancing, and have never advanced, a right-wing political and economic agenda since taking office. No federal or provincial political party on the right has ever done this in our country's history. (Some of us wish they had, but that's a different story.) Rather, they're following a political and economic path shaped by incremental conservatism. As noted by the University of Calgary's Tom Flanagan, this particular strategy leads to "endorsing even very small steps if they are in the right direction, and accepting inaction in areas that can't feasibly be changed right now, but opposing government initiatives that are clearly going the wrong way."

This helps explain why the Tories have consistently favoured targeted tax credits instead of broad-based tax relief; why they have supported small-scale private reforms to social services, and maintained commitments to publicly funded programs like universal health care, and why they have promoted a stronger role for Canada in international affairs rather than simply abandoning hapless organizations like the United Nations.

There is no hidden Tory political agenda. There is no elaborate scheme to dramatically alter Canadian ideas and values. Rather, these policies are designed to decrease government's overwhelming role in our daily lives and increase individual rights, economic freedom and democratic values.

Have there been some bumps in the road? Of course. Last year's Senate scandal was a huge political setback for the Tory government. At the same time, the elimination of the federal budget deficit in 2015, the open skies agreement with Mexico, and the monumental trade deal with the European Union are all direct results of the Tory policy of incremental conservatism.

Harper's steady political hand and economic stewardship have made us a financial success among G20 countries. His vital interest in foreign policy matters has made our country a leader on the international stage. And, of course, his principled and honourable support for Israel is commendable and deserves our thanks.

Sure, there will always be Jews who vote for left-wing parties. Yet a growing number of them realize a Tory-led Canada has greater political and economic potential than a Liberal-led Canada ever did. Contrary to popular belief, they're not going to abandon the Tories anytime soon. ■

York U, Technion agree to partnership

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Lassonde School of Engineering at York University and the Technion Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa have entered into a strategic partnership that could ultimately see students at the two educational institutions jointly develop commercially viable projects.

The partnership will allow Lassonde students to develop their entrepreneurial skills based on the Technion model, said Janusz Kozinski, dean of Lassonde.

"Twenty-five of our people will go to the Technion and learn just how they do entrepreneurial education," Kozinski explained.

The Lassonde personnel are particularly interested in learning "how they create an ecosystem at the Technion that's the best in the world, better than MIT," he added. "It's a unique opportunity to learn from the best."

The "first phase" or "test drive" of the project is scheduled to kick off in August, when 25 Lassonde students, faculty and administrators will visit the Technion's Haifa campus "to learn more about the educational approach and how they teach entrepreneurship," said Kozinski.

Spokespeople for the Technion welcome the arrangement with Lassonde.

"The program that the Lassonde School of Engineering and York University aims to take at Technion in August is a first step in a more comprehensive and large scale co-operation between the universities," said Ariel Geva, managing director of Technion's International School in Israel.

"The Lassonde project is both the first time it is done with a Canadian university and also the longest faculty led entrepreneurship program. Technion e.Xpert Program aims at capitalizing on Israel's innovative and entrepreneurial success and the Technion's reputation as a world-class academic institution with a solid track record in entrepreneurial activity both on campus and through its alumni. The program is based on partnering with peer leading schools to enrich students' knowledge in entrepreneurship," Geva added.

Following the initial week at the Technion's campus, students will head off for one week at spinoff companies created by Technion students.

In the last week they will visit larger, more mature companies whose businesses are related to the ventures they hope to start in Canada. That way students and faculty can witness first hand the entire chain – from education, to startup to mature corporation, Kozinski said.

The Lassonde participants are particularly interested in medical devices, public safety and security solutions, as well as civil infrastructure, including buildings, roads and materials, he added.

The second phase of the proposed arrangement will see participants from both sides jointly invest in businesses they create together.

Janusz Kozinski

> Program aims at capitalizing on Israel's innovative and entrepreneurial succcess and Technion's reputation as a world-class academic institution

So far, Lassonde students seem to be quite enthusiastic about the partnership with Technion, Kozinski said. A preliminary meeting that featured a talk by Hershel Recht, national development director of Technion Canada, was well attended.

"I've never had so many undergraduate students at a meeting with the dean," Kozinski said. "They are into it."

Asked whether there were any naysayers at the university, who object to joint programs with an Israeli school, Kozinski said, "There is always some place for nonsense in the world. It's inevitable. We're doing what's best for our students and faculty.

"If you want to do something for the betterment of the school and students, then I don't think there will be any problem with it."

Geva said a recent MIT survey ranked Technion as one of the world's leading universities – in sixth place – for "Creating an Eco-System of Entrepreneurship and Innovation," but as the top university for doing so under challenging circumstances.

Technion, he noted, has trained many of the country's top engineers and managers.

It has been at the forefront of the innovation and entrepreneurship that has led Israel to be dubbed "start-up nation," said Geva. ■

Rabbis shave their heads for cancer research

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rabbi Micah Streiffer of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill and Rabbi Stephen Wise of Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville participated in a fundraising initiative called Shave for the Brave April 1 at the annual Reform rabbinical convention in Chicago.

Seventy-four Reform rabbis from across North America took part in the shave, inspired by rabbis Phyllis and Michael Sommer's eight-year-old son, "Superman Sam," a nickname he acquired during his brave fight against cancer.

"Superman Sam" was diagnosed in June 2012 with acute myeloid leukemia and died on Dec. 14.

The participating rabbis have raised almost $600,000 for St. Baldrick's Foundation, a charity committed to funding the most promising research on childhood cancers.

"My young cousin, Olivia Wise, recently passed away. When I heard that 'Superman Sam' had died, that hit close to home. We are a very tight-knit community, and I wanted to pay tribute to my cousin, Olivia, and to Sam, as well.

Rabbi Stephen Wise, left, and Rabbi Micah Streiffer after the shave. Inset: Sam Sommer aka 'Superman Sam'

"I was nervous about shaving my head, but I think that is why this works because it is something you don't normally do – it was an opportunity for all of us to do something out of our comfort zone," Rabbi Wise said.

"For me, shaving my head was the least I could do to recognize the pain and the bravery of these extraordinary people [rabbis Phyllis and Michael Sommer] who went though this, and of this wonderful, amazing child whose life was lost far too early," said Rabbi Streiffer.

The shave was watched by several hundred rabbis following their evening program. The participating rabbis were given green St. Baldrick T-shirts – though some chose to wear Superman T-shirts – as well as a specially designed kippah.

"The cameras were rolling, as was a live stream [people as far away as Israel were watching]. The rabbis were called up on stage. Sam's parents spoke to the crowd about how much money had been raised and how meaningful this was to them. Eight barbers from the Chicago area rolled out plastic across the stage and pulled out their clippers and started shaving us while hundreds of rabbis were cheering and clapping," Rabbi Wise said.

"Superman Sam was the inspiration, but everybody there had a story of someone they knew affected by childhood cancer."

According to the Childhood Cancer Canada Foundation, about 10,000 children are living with cancer in Canada. Each year, about 1,500 cases are diagnosed. Leukemia as well as tumors of the brain and nervous system, lymphatic system, kidneys, bones and muscles are the most common childhood cancers.

Cancers are responsible for more childhood deaths in this country than any other disease – more than asthma, diabetes, cystic fibrosis and AIDS combined. About one in four children who are diagnosed with cancer will die of the disease.

Rabbi Streiffer told The CJN about his new bald look.

"My head is cold and I am having a little trouble keeping a kippah on my head. People have suggested double-stick or superglue," he said.

"On the other hand, it's very conspicuous, and it has given me an opportunity to talk to people about this cause. When someone comes up to me and asks, 'Why are you bald?' suddenly it gives me the opportunity to let them know why I did this and why this cause was important, and why I participated in this initiative." ■

Irwin Igra had consented to donate his organs before his death.

Health

Organ donation: It's completely kosher

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Irwin Igra collapsed with a brain aneurysm last April 24 and was rushed to Toronto's St. Michael's Hospital. He was declared brain dead 24 hours later.

Igra and his wife, Joanne Shinwell, had signed the back of their drivers' licences "years ago," she said, registering their consent to donate their organs and tissue. Still, she says, "I'd been indoctrinated that Jews can't do it."

Shinwell knew she wanted her husband's organs and tissues to be donated, but she also wanted to be absolutely sure it was "kosher." She was worried that her husband wouldn't be buried in a Jewish cemetery without his organs and tissues intact.

From the hospital, Shinwell had telephoned David Rosen, the cantor of the couple's shul, Beth Radom Congregation, and he came down to speak to the family, which includes two children: Danielle, who's now 21, and Jonathan, 18.

When she asked Rosen about organ donation, the cantor told her "most definitely, it's better to save a life" and assured her "it was OK," she said, and that her husband could still be buried in a Jewish cemetery.

The hospital then contacted the Trillium Gift of Life Network (TGL), an Ontario government agency that plans, promotes, co-ordinates and supports organ and tissue donation and transplantation across Ontario. Shinwell was put in touch with a Trillium representative.

"The people at Trillium were so respectful of how we were feeling," Shinwell said. "She [the Trillium representative] answered every question, every concern. She followed up with us the next day. She was very empathic."

Igra, a self-employed senior investment adviser who volunteered in the minor hockey community, was well known. His funeral was attended by about 1,000 people. Shinwell said her husband was a gregarious fellow with a big, booming voice. "He made it his business to speak to as many people as possible."

Minutes before the funeral, "we got the message that Irwin's retinas were being planted," Shinwell said. "It was very comforting for me." She added that her husband's kidneys and cornea were also donated, along with various tissues for research. "Out of that terrible situation, something good happened. Someone can see, someone doesn't have to be on dialysis."

Shinwell said she and her husband were a normal couple in a normal family when the tragedy struck. "You don't expect anything like this to happen," she said, adding that "you need to have a conversation with your loved ones. As awful as it was, I knew what I wanted because we spoke about it, because those are tough decisions to make."

With her husband's birthday coming up, Shinwell will be speaking at Beth Radom's organ and tissue donation educational event on May 5, along with Dov Altman, who had a double lung transplant last year, Rosen, who donated a kidney to his mother, and a rabbi who will discuss organ donation and Halachah.

Education is one of the mandates of the National Council of Jewish Women Canada's (NCJWC) Gift of Life Organ and Tissue Donation Program. NCJWC partnered with TGL in 2011.

Rates of registration for organ donation are low, according to TGL – 24 per cent in Ontario and 15 per cent in Toronto – and people are dying waiting for transplants. At this writing, 1,534 people are waiting for organ transplants in Ontario. In 2012, 161 Canadians died while they were waiting, 97 of them in Ontario, according to a Canadian Institute of Health report. One donor can save up to eight lives and enhance the lives of up to 75 others through tissue donation.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of the TGL board, helped the NCJWC create literature that explains the Jewish view of organ and tissue donation. "The value of pikuach nefesh (saving a life), which is at the core of organ donation, is a principle shared by the entire Jewish community, regardless of denominational affiliation," the literature states.

To the question, doesn't Judaism require us to be buried with our bodies intact?, the literature states that "Judaism clearly draws a distinction in the case of donating organs and tissues in order to save a life. The saving of a life is the greatest mitzvah a Jew can perform. This is an overriding principle."

Ronda Pinsky, chair of NCJWC's gift of life program, said that most Jews she speaks to say they believe organ donation is a good thing but "they're scared, so we combat that."

NCJWC fights that fear by holding educational events. The group is currently using Facebook to promote the cause, and in future they will be using other social media. NCJWC also asks local rabbis to add the subject of organ donation to their sermons on yontif.

The NCJWC-Toronto be-a-donor web page, online at https://beadonor.ca/ncjwc-ts, which was put up in April 2012 and aimed for 200 registrations, now has 394. Pinsky said that it's important to register, not just to sign the back of your driver's licence or keep a yellow donor card in your pocket, as they may not be accessible in an emergency. ■

April is BeADonor Month in Ontario. For it, the NCJWC is holding an event to promote organ and tissue donation registration, along with a blood donor clinic, at the NCJWC building at 4700 Bathurst St. in Toronto on April 28.

Guest Voice

Downtown Toronto is a whole different world

CHARLES HELLER

South of St Clair Avenue is a foreign country: they do things differently there.

"I wouldn't live downtown if you paid me!" said our friend B., when we told him we'd moved out of Bathurst Manor. "Wait till the winter! You'll never get out of the lane!"

He was right. We got stuck in the unplowed snowdrifts so often that we ended up having to buy a new car that could get us out. But the best solution was to get rid of our second car altogether. The traffic is terrible, you get stuck behind streetcars, and parking is expensive – $3 just to get to the morning minyan (and an extra $1 for time to enjoy our man Dave's deluxe breakfast – scrambled eggs, pancakes, and kippers on a good day!).

Who needs a car if everything is within walking distance? Stores, concerts, movies, shuls: there's the Kiever and the Minsker in their beautiful original buildings, with signs and inscriptions in the distinctive downtown Toronto Yiddish dialect: Shul gebildet in 1930 (This shul was built in 1930), Men darf du gor nisht dreyen (Absolutely no wandering around during the service), Avegzetsen oyf a seat (Sit in your seat!), "We have the best baalei tefiles" (prayer leaders).

Then there are the new communities covering the entire religious and gender spectrum. On the first night of Shavuot, hundreds of people converge at the Miles Nadel JCC for the all-night tikkun, with learning sessions covering every conceivable (and inconceivable) topic of Jewish interest, organized in conjunction with Limmud. Of course there are vegan snacks all through the night – you can't be downtown without a vegan alternative. (How fondly I recall those Bathurst Manor street parties of yore, with their kosher hot dogs and doughnuts! A heart attack in every bite, God forbid.)

Walking is good for you. The City of Toronto has actually mapped out which neighbourhoods have the fittest people – it's the ones downtown, where every street has sidewalks and there is something interesting to see on the corner. By walking around, you bump into people, and from these unplanned interactions emerge the ideas that make cities work. People have written books about this, starting with the classic Death and Life of Great American Cities by Jane Jacobs, the patron saint of downtown. There is even a whole subject area about it, called "emergence".

> Who needs a car if everything is within walking distance? Stores, concerts, movies, shuls: there's the Kiever and the Minsker in their beautiful original buildings, with signs and inscriptions in the distinctive downtown Toronto Yiddish dialect

And talking of emergence, how about this: every month I like to get to the Yiddish Vinkl, which meets at the Free Times Café on College Street. I was on my way there recently when I bumped into Sabrina from Shoresh Organic Farm (I love their logo – a Magen David made out of beetroot). Which is how I found out about the plans to plant a vegetable garden at the Kiever shul in memory of shul treasurer and patriarch Max Pinkus, who died last year at age 100 – a remarkable testimony to the benefits of healthy eating. All we need is a break in the weather, and we're ready for planting.

Toronto Jews have identified with the reawakened sense of downtown as a desirable place to live, and the historic Jewish downtown, which was for a time on the verge of being abandoned, is now being revitalized. New congregations have sprung up, such as Rabbi Aaron Levy's Makom and, more recently, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein's City Shul.

And now the Koffler Centre of the Arts has moved to spanking new premises at Queen and Shaw. On opening night, as I walked past the First Nations drummer, I bumped into my friend Moish, who I usually see at the Markham Street shul sholosh sudes on Saturday afternoons.

"Nu," he said, "isn't it a mechayeh (a life-enriching experience) to be down here?!" ■

Robbins' students win debating tournament

CJN STAFF

Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) students, Jack Lipton and Danielle Sharir-Smith, standing in back, comprised the winning team at the fourth annual Jewish Middle School Debate Tournament, held at Leo Baeck Day School's north campus on April 3.

Tournament judges were, seated, Joel Kurtz, Amy Goldsweig, and Eli Savage, standing at right, a Leo Baeck Middle School teacher and tournament founder.

With seven schools, the debating competition saw its largest participation yet, including Associated Hebrew Schools (Danilack campus), Bialik Hebrew Day School, The Toronto Heschel School, both campuses of Leo Baeck, Netivot Hatorah, and RHA.

"We started with three participating schools and fewer than 50 students," said Savage, who initiated the tournament four years ago. "Now it has grown to seven schools, incorporating 150 students."

The goal was not only to bring the broader Jewish student community together, but also to fill a certain void.

"In today's generation," said Savage, "face to face communication is dying out, and thus the skills are diminishing. This heightens the importance of debating."

Seeing it more as an experience than as a competition, Savage believes it reinforces students' sense of Jewish community and dreams of expanding it to other cities in Canada and North America. ■

Community invited to celebrate Mimouna

sshefa@cjnews.com

A Toronto-based organization that promotes Moroccan-Jewish culture will be hosting a Mimouna celebration to mark the end of Pesach and the beginning of a new agricultural season.

Simon Keslassy, the president of the Communauté Juive Marocaine de Toronto (CJMT), which represents the 18,000-strong Moroccan-Jewish community in Toronto, said this event, scheduled for April 22 at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, is a first for his organization.

The origins of the celebration, held the evening that Pesach ends, are unclear, but some believe it marks the death date of Maimon ben Joseph, the father of the great Jewish philosopher, Maimonides.

Others believe the tradition is linked to the Arabic word for health and good fortune, ma'amoun.

In addition to being able to eat chametz again, Mimouna also marks the beginning of spring.

Keslassy said he hopes this event, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will attract people from both the Ashkenazi and Sephardi communities in Toronto.

> We celebrate this in Israel, Morocco and France, and everywhere where there are people of Sephardi heritage origins

"We celebrate this in Israel, Morocco and France, and everywhere where there are people of Sephardi heritage origins," he said.

"That's why we invite the Ashkenazim to be part of it, so they know what Mimouna is all about."

The event will feature a sweet table featuring traditional Moroccan treats, including moufletta, a thin, fried crepe drizzled with honey.

"Moufletta is one custom for every Moroccan, so we're going to have that," he said.

"We're also going to have lettuce with honey. It's significant because we say a brachah to the children with the lettuce and honey... that this year will be a prosperous year," Keslassy said, adding that this custom is the most important one.

The event will also feature music and a film screening about the tradition of Mimouna in different Moroccan cities. The guests are encouraged to wear traditional Moroccan garb – jilabas and kaftans. ■

Incidents of anti-Semitism fell in 2013: B'nai Brith

CJN STAFF

Canada-wide incidents of vandalism, violence and harassment targeting the Jewish community dropped by 5.3 per cent in 2013 compared to the year before, according to the Annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, published by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

Altogether 1,274 cases were recorded by the League. While harassment dropped by 13.9 per cent in 2013 from 2012, incidents of vandalism and violence increased by 21.6 per cent and 7.7 per cent respectively.

The League speculated that reporting of harassment may be down because of feared social repercussions and retaliation in the workforce, plus the reluctance of law enforcement to "resolve complaints."

The overall trend over 10 years showed a 49 per cent increase in the level of anti-Semitism in Canada, said Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada.

"Although the numbers for this year are down slightly, hatred of Jews has veered so far into normative discourse that it is no longer seen as wrong," said Dimant.

Anti-Semitic imagery and harassment is especially prevalent on Canadian campuses, he added.

"The de facto replacement of 'The Jew' with Israel, combined with the constant barrage of Holocaust imagery in relation to the Jewish state and Jews and its supporters, create a visceral sense of apprehension," Dimant said. ■

Plenty-o-Gefiltefish in this group

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The social media have revolutionized the way people meet.

Ron Dragushan was not looking for a website for Jewish singles 45 and over when he came across a Toronto Meetup group called Plenty-o-Gefiltefish.

"When you are in your 50s or 60s, Jewish older adults want to meet new people" says Dragushan, a divorced 60-plus technical writer and media specialist with an 11-year-old daughter. Until recently, there were very few non-pressure places to meet.

"Now it is as easy as turning on your computer for real-life connections."

Dragushan, who is one of the organizers of Plenty-o-Gefiltefish, told The CJN that today, boomers and beyond – never marrieds, divorced and widowed – are looking for networks of friends for social activities, and they look to the growing number of Meetup groups.

"At Plenty-o-Gefiltefish we have people with numerous interests, and we organize potlucks, day trips, holiday celebrations, pub nights, book reviews, theatre, fund-raising events and more."

Plenty-o-Gefiltefish was formed in 2010 by Beth Komito-Gottlieb. There are now more than 450 members.

When people register for membership on the Internet, which is free, they are asked, "Are you Jewish, single and between 45 and 69?"

But, he added, "we don't kick out anyone if they turn 70."

Members can post pictures and a profile describing themselves. Although some members contact other members with similar interests, most meet other members at planned events.

"This is a more casual and a low-stress way of meeting other singles. Although this is not a dating site, some people have made lasting relationships."

Members pay only for the events they participate in, Dragushan said. "They only pay in advance when there are costs involved, such as for food at a restaurant."

Plenty-o-Gefiltefish is organized by volunteers. ■

A sense of collective Jewish identification

Israeli films will by definition be considered Jewish films, be they documentary or narrative, animated or live action.

Narrative films are more difficult to categorize than documentaries. A film, such as Twelve Years a Slave, whose subject is marginalized people or enslavement or religious freedom or genocide will be of profound interest to a Jewish audience, but would not be deemed a "Jewish film" if it is not explicitly about a Jewish character or theme: Israel, the Diaspora, Jewish identity, Jewish characters struggling with their religious or cultural heritage, interfaith challenges, religious conflict, Jews in the arts.

However we may define a Jewish film, we probably come back to "we know it when we see it." Happily, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival programmers and the festival help us see, learn from and enjoy a myriad of narratives and documentaries that enlarge our Jewish perspective and engage our imaginations.

STUART HANDS
TJFF program manager

As program manager, the answer for me is quite elusive, especially when it comes to representations of secular Jewish identity.

This question brings to mind my first year working at TJFF, when I helped Ellie Skrow curate a series of films that explored the relationship between blacks and Jews in the creation of American music. At the same time, I was completing my master's degree relating to Jews and the Popular Front in the '30s and '40s, of which singer/actor/activist Paul Robeson was a significant icon.

So Ellie and I both felt strongly about including a documentary on Robeson in the context of the series, even though the film itself contained barely any reference to his strong Jewish fan base, or the fact that he sang many Jewish folk songs in Hebrew and Yiddish.

To our delight, the Robeson film was the very first screening to sell out that year. I have never seen a TJFF audience quite as passionate as the one that showed up on that sunny Friday afternoon. Several men, then in their 90s, came up to us, enthusiastically recalling seeing Robeson in concert many years before. And there was much cheering during the screening itself, cheering his music as well as his political integrity, which most of that audience still cherished.

Although perhaps the Robeson documentary was not a "Jewish film" in the strictest sense of the term, it produced a passionate feeling of collective identification among a specifically Jewish audience, which to me felt quite magical. Allowing such experiences to happen, and the possibility to reflect on them, is very important to me as a programmer at TJFF.

SUSAN STARKMAN
TJFF programmer

Few questions generate more debate in our programming meetings than what constitutes a Jewish film. Like the various branches of Judaism, the responses range from clearly defined orthodox positions to more liberal interpretations. Heeb magazine's list of top 100 Jewish movie moments fits into the former category, citing films with overtly Jewish content.

In contrast, Tablet magazine's recent top 100 Jewish films fits squarely in the latter group. Its No. 1 Jewish movie of all time: E.T. The film's Jewish sense of "exilic longing" and "existential dread" were offered by the editors as reasons for bestowing the coveted position on this less than obvious choice.

Though I can understand the reasoning behind Tablet's decision to see E.T. as a Jewish film, I can't say I agree. Any film can be seen through a Jewish lens, but that does not make it a Jewish film. Consequently, assigning a Jewish label to E.T. seems to be imposing a Jewish perspective that is not in keeping with the film's other tropes.

Admittedly, my own opinion on what defines a Jewish film is based rather more on gut feeling than on any hard and fast definition. However, I do believe that to merit a position in a Jewish film festival, the Jewish element needs to stem organically from within the film. A Jewish film is one whose content, at least in part, reflects on, illuminates, or even obfuscates some aspect of the Jewish "experience."

This year's inclusion of Marvin Seth and Stanley in the TJFF is a perfect example. Apart from the family's surname (Greenstein), there is little overt Jewish content in it. However, the family dynamics, the dialogue and the overall sensibility of the film are inarguably Jewish.

The definition of a Jewish film, like Judaism itself, is evolving. Undoubtedly, the programming team at the festival will continue to debate this same question with the intensity of yeshiva students arguing over an obscure talmudic passage. How Jewish is that? ■

Quebec Jews welcome Liberal victory

JANICE ARNOLD
MONTREAL
jarnold@cjnews.ca

There is a sense in the Montreal Jewish community that Quebec has entered a new political and social era with the election of a majority Liberal government on April 7.

Whether the defeat of the Parti Québécois (PQ) after 18 months in office was a rejection of its proposed charter of values or the possibility of another sovereignty referendum, or, in fact, support for Philippe Couillard's offer of a stable government that focuses on the issues that affect people most directly, Quebec has emerged from under the cloud of sectarian strife.

Public opinions polls in the latter half of the 33-day campaign showed the Liberals were steadily gaining in popularity, yet few federalists dared count on the party's capturing 70 of the 125 seats in the National Assembly and more than 41 per cent of the popular vote.

Community leaders are already speaking of a much more positive climate where Jews "view themselves as part and parcel of Quebec and see their future here.

"The charter had broken a modus vivendi in Quebec in which we had acknowledged the French fact... But all of a sudden, you not only had to speak French, but kowtow to the government in how you express your religious beliefs," Luciano Del Negro, Quebec vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

The new government, he believes, must immediately repair the harm caused by the "toxic" debate over the charter that the PQ launched last August leading up to the tabling of Bill 60 in November.

While Del Negro agrees the charter was not a major issue in the election campaign, he interprets the result as a "clear no" from Quebecers to what he sees as having been a cynical ploy by the PQ to stir up anxiety over the growth of religious minorities in order to get a majority and then create favourable conditions for a third referendum.

"This is a resounding vote of confidence that we are all Quebecers, it's the defeat of a divisive vision... It's not so much the end of the independence movement, but that the PQ is no longer seen as representing a force for progress, especially among the young."

The increasing strength of the third-party Coalition Avenir Québec, which gained four seats to 22, is also indicative of the desire for a new way, he thinks.

"The PQ was the architect of its own demise. It threw away its principles. It sold its soul... It's a bit ironic that the party that was musing about firing workers [who defied the charter's ban on religious symbols among public employees] got fired themselves."

The non-partisan CIJA's tepid relations with Premier Pauline Marois soured during the campaign when she refused to repudiate her Gouin candidate, Louise Mailloux, whom CIJA accused of anti-Semitism for alleging kashrut certification is, essentially, a racket in which all Quebecers are victims.

Philippe Couillard

Mailloux, a college philosophy teacher, finished second, but almost 10,000 votes behind the incumbent, François David of Québec Solidaire.

As for Couillard, Del Negro said there is some history between him and the community from when he was health minister in Jean Charest's government and since he became leader last year.

"He has always been available to the community to discuss the charter and other matters," Del Negro said. "We look forward to his being the premier of all Quebecers."

Nevertheless, the possibility of some kind of new legislation reinforcing the principles of state neutrality and providing a framework for dealing with reasonable accommodation requests from religious groups can't be ruled out.

In January, the Liberal party issued its policy on the issue, which emphasized the necessity of public employees who represent state authority, such as police officers and prison guards, only being allowed to wear religious symbols after they have made the effort to "integrate."

Sole Jewish MNA took 92 per cent of the vote

Couillard, a neurosurgeon who once practised in Saudi Arabia, stated at the time: "Our position hinges on respect for what we are and for what defines us collectively, historically and culturally. I understand and share concerns expressed by Quebecers regarding the rise of religious fundamentalism."

The Liberal position is that the primacy of state religious neutrality be included in the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms (as Bill 60 proposed), and that any accommodation made for a person's religious beliefs be in keeping with that tenet, as well as respect for gender equality.

It was a Liberal government under Charest that a few years ago tabled Bill 94, which would have banned face coverings in the delivery or receipt of public services. It died on the order paper.

The most recent polls on the charter found 63 per cent in favour in Montreal and about 53 per cent in the regions, contradicting the assumption it played best with those less exposed to other cultures.

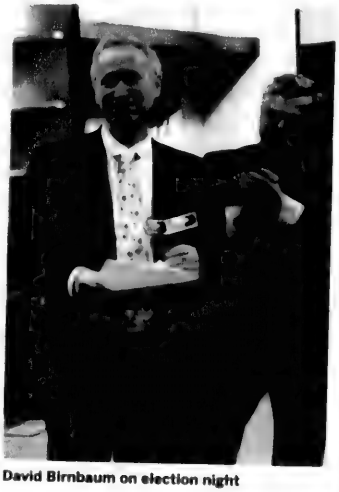
"I think the government should exercise extreme caution in re-opening the charter of rights," said Del Negro. "There is a consensus in Quebec on state secularism, the need for a framework to resolve reasonable accommodation requests, and on the equality of men and women, but the charter of rights is there fundamentally to protect minorities…

"The Jewish community has always been incredibly cautious in dealing with the charter of rights. It believes it is adequate. There is de facto recognition of state secularism and the human rights commission has jurisdiction to deal with reasonable accommodation."

The sole Jewish MNA, Liberal David Birnbaum, took 92 per cent of the vote in Montreal's D'Arcy McGee, the only riding with a Jewish majority. There is speculation the newcomer could be named to the cabinet, possibly the education portfolio.

"This is a new opportunity for Quebecers, whatever their background or affiliation, to be part of part of a movement forward, rather than division… What I saw in my riding was a great deal of sadness and anger over what might lie ahead if the PQ was re-elected. Now, they feel a part of Quebec again and that they are not looking from the outside at a very destructive [course the PQ was taking]."

Birnbaum, 58, was director general of the Quebec English School Boards Association and a past executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region. He replaces Lawrence Bergman, who resigned at the start of the campaign after 20 years in office.



David Birnbaum on election night

Elsewhere, the fourth-party Québec Solidaire (QS) elected a third member for the first time in its short history, Manon Massé in Ste. Marie-St. Jacques by a narrow 91 votes.

Massé, who has been a social justice activist for 30 years, was aboard the Canadian boat that was part of an international flotilla that attempted to reach Gaza in 2011. QS supported that unsuccessful effort to break the Israeli blockade and deliver purported humanitarian aid to the Palestinians.

The left-wing sovereigntist party officially endorses the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

Ste. Marie-St. Jacques is in the Plateau Mont-Royal, and encompasses the block on St. Denis Street where the Le Marcheur and Naot shoe stores are located, which have been targets of BDS demonstrators in the last few years.

Besides David, the QS MNA Amir Khadir, an outspoken critic of Israel, was re-elected for a third term in neighbouring Mercier riding.

Nevertheless, CIJA wants to keep the channels of communication open with all parties. "We have a fundamental disagreement with the QS… but as long as it is kept civil and honest, we can agree to disagree," Del Negro said.

B'nai Brith Canada also believes this is a time to "mend fences" and hopes Couillard will reach out to all Quebecers to allow them to "feel at home in the province once more." ■

Rabbinic caucus holds two-day 'fly-in' in Ottawa

plungen@cjnews.com

A group of 28 rabbis from across the country gathered in Ottawa last week to meet lawmakers, diplomats and representatives of other faith groups to discuss public policy issues of concern to their congregations.

Meeting under the auspices of the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus (CRC), the religious leaders discussed the rise of anti-Semitism with the French ambassador; they met representatives of the three main national parties in Ottawa to exchange views on the Middle East peace process and the danger posed by Iran; and they convened for a lecture by Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner on the Jewish view of assisted suicide.

The CRC operates as a branch of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). It was formerly part of the Canada-Israel Committee, but was dormant for several years after that organization was dissolved, said Howard English, CIJA's senior vice-president for the Greater Toronto Area.

The CRC includes rabbis from across the country and from all strands of Judaism – Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist.

The group is chaired by Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of the Conservative Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Orthodox Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Montreal, and Rabbi Jonathan Infeld of the Conservative Congregation Beth Israel in Vancouver. The CRC's vice-chair is Reform Rabbi Debra Landsberg of Toronto.

CIJA revived the caucus to benefit from its guidance and input, to establish another influential Jewish voice on the Canadian scene and as a line of communications to the participating congregations.

"The rabbis represent a very large constituency within the Jewish community," English said. "Synagogues are the most popular institutions to which Jews belong, so they are influential and [the rabbis] can transmit the nuances of issues to a lot of people.

"The rabbis offer a point of view to which people of influence will listen," he added.

During their two-day "fly-in," the rabbis met with Liberal party leader Justin Trudeau, the foreign affairs critics of the Liberal and New Democratic parties, French Ambassador Philippe Zeller, officials in the offices of Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and the Prime Minister's Office, as well as with senior representatives of the Anglican Church and the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

They also met with Israel's ambassador to Ottawa, Rafael Barak.

Rabbi Infeld said the fly-in afforded "an opportunity for rabbis to learn from these people and express our concerns."

As to whether the rabbis were of one mind when it came to their views on the issues, Rabbi Infeld said, "We're Jewish, so I don't think there's a fully unified opinion on anything. But we have things in common.

"For all of us… I think the importance of Israel was clear."

Rabbi Infeld was gushing in praising Rabbi Torczyner's presentation on assisted suicide. And he said the meeting with Ambassador Barak presented the opportunity to discuss ways Israel, as the cultural and religious capital of the Jewish People, could assist in strengthening Jewish education in Canada.

English said the caucus "strengthens congregations to know rabbis are participating on issues of national scope that are important for the Jewish people in Canada, if not worldwide."

In addition to its three national co-chairs, the CRC features an 18-person executive committee consisting of six rabbis from each of the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform streams. ■

St. John has only Jewish historical museum in region

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

Saint John, N.B. is the second oldest Jewish community in Maritime Canada with its roots dating to the mid-1800s, about a century after Halifax welcomed its first Jewish citizen.

However, Saint John stands ahead of everyone with the only Jewish Historical Museum in the region, a site supported through artifact donations and other participation by members of the local Jewish community, and visited by more than 4,000 people annually.

The museum has several permanent exhibits, new exhibits each year, occasional travelling exhibits, as well as a library and archive of Jewish history. Outreach programs include hosting tours from local schools, distribution of educational kits, and offering guided tours to cruise ship visitors.

Long-time resident Marcia Koven fulfilled her dream of creating the museum in 1983 as she saw the decline of the Jewish community's once-vibrant population.

Join Toronto contingent for New York's Celebrate Israel Parade

For the first time ever, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is organizing a contingent to New York, New York for the 50th Annual Celebrate Israel Parade and you are welcome to be a part of it.

And, if you have family or friends living in the New York City Region, why not have the ultimate family reunion by joining us on Sunday, June 1st, and participate in this historic event? Even if you don't, why not come anyway and join the fun? We especially want to connect to the many Torontonians, especially college students and young professionals, in the New York region and have them join us.

The 50th Annual Celebrate Israel parade takes place on June 1st in New York City

Join the more than 100,000 proud participants who will be parading up Manhattan's Fifth Avenue in celebration of the Jewish state.

Kicked off by the blowing of shofars, the Parade, witnessed by one million spectators, includes colorful floats, marching bands, celebrities, politicians, and various other participants.

Chaired by Judy Bronfman, and with the help of our New York-based volunteer Naomi Matlow, (naomimatlow@gmail.com), the Toronto contingent will have the opportunity to attend a mid-afternoon Israel Day music concert in honor of the day in Central Park and, as the sun sets, the Empire State Building also becomes part of the festivities when it is bathed in the blue and white colors of the Israeli flag.

"As Chair of Toronto's inaugural participation in New York City's 50 year old parade, I am both proud and challenged to lead this exciting initiative," says Bronfman. "I am excited by the opportunity to rally Torontonians studying in New York, young professionals working there and their parents in support of Israel and invite other Canadians to join us. Our community has a great opportunity to create a new and exciting partnership with our neighbours. It is a chance to experience firsthand that we are part of a wide and proud Jewish people. We welcome all Canadians from both countries to join us as we parade through Manhattan on June 1st."

Immigration from northern and eastern Europe brought the community to about 1,400 members in the 1920s but, by the 1960s, Saint John's Jewish population fell to about 300 members. Today there are roughly two dozen Jewish families in the congregation.

Koven collected community history through oral interviews with elderly members and through photographs, organization minutes, and other records.

She rented a small studio to hold her collection until the museum opened its doors in the summer of 1986 with a modest exhibit on the lower level of the Jewish Community Centre.

In succeeding years, with Koven as curator, the museum, open only in the summer months for tourists, expanded to encompass nearly the entire community centre building. By 1990, the museum started welcoming group tours from local schools, churches, and social organizations throughout the fall, winter and early spring. Today, it is a year-round operation.

When Koven retired as curator in 1998, Katherine Biggs-Craft, who had a strong art and history background but no Jewish connection, was hired.

"People tell me I know more about Judiasm, Jewish history and the community here than many who were born and bred in Saint John," she laughs, while admitting she is learning more and more all the time as she deals with artifacts, books and pieces of the history of the long-time community.

The collection has grown so that Biggs-Craft has to pick and choose what will be displayed at any one time.

"There is a permanent exhibit which includes a Hebrew school classroom and 'From The Cradle to the Grave', a display focusing on the history of the Saint John Jewish community and on religious practices and traditions."

Other display areas change annually to feature some aspect of the community's life, such as Jewish weddings, servicemen and women in World War II, bar and bat mitzvahs, Jewish businesses in Saint John, and notable men and women who have come from or lived in this community.

The 2014 exhibit will be on Pamdenac, a summer cottage community about 20 kilometres from Saint John that, between the mid-1940s and the late 1970s, housed more than 50 Jewish families plus hundreds of annual visitors. Biggs-Craft has assembled many photographs, artifacts, written memories, even old Yiddish record albums, games and sporting equipment from those decades.

In 1995, the museum created a series of eight Jewish educational outreach kits to teach students and others about the Jewish religion and way of life, and create understanding. They are sent, on a two-week loan, to schools and churches throughout New Brunswick and even to organizations in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

A high school Holocaust study group is held annually, culminating on Yom Hashoah when the museum organizes a guest speaker and program.

"The students in the group, 18 this year, hear from speakers and survivors, and do book reports, PowerPoint presentations, or write poetry, music or do painting as their final project," says Biggs-Craft. "Their work is displayed at the Museum on Yom Hashoah when we attract more than 300 people."

The mandate of the museum is to collect, display and preserve articles related specifically to the Saint John Jewish community, and to educate and to provide a research facility for genealogists, historians, and religious scholars. ■

K.C. gunman was KKK 'grand dragon'

Police investigating whether attacks were a hate crime

JTA
WASHINGTON

The suspect in the deadly April 13 shooting attack on two Jewish targets in a Kansas City, Kan., suburb was identified as a prominent white supremacist.

The Southern Poverty Law Center, a hate group monitor, identified the alleged gunman as Frazier Glenn Miller, 73, of Aurora, Mo., and said he was the "grand dragon" of the Carolina Knights of the Ku Klux Klan in the 1980s and subsequently a founder of the White Patriot Party. The centre said Miller served three years in prison on weapons charges and for plotting the assassination of its founder, Morris Dees.

CBS News also identified the suspect as Miller, and a security source confirmed to JTA that the suspect had a long history in the supremacist movement.

Miller is suspected of killing a grandfather and his grandson at the Jewish Community Centre in Overland Park, Kan., then killing a female resident of Village Shalom, a Jewish assisted-living facility a few blocks away.

The family of the victims killed at the JCC identified them as William Lewis Corporon and his 14-year-old grandson, Reat Griffin Underwood. A local TV station said they were members of the Church of Resurrection.

The JCC was reportedly hosting a dance class and an audition for a play, both for teenagers.

U.S. President Barack Obama pledged "the full support of the federal government" in the investigation, while Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sent condolences to the families of those killed.

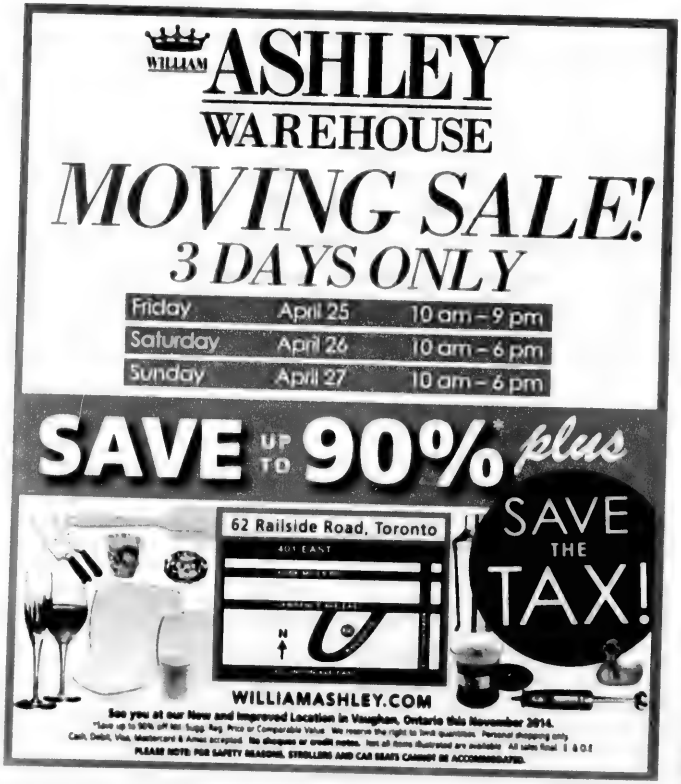
"We condemn the murder that by all the signs was done out of hatred of Jews. The State of Israel, as one with all civilized people, is obligated to struggle against this blight," Netanyahu said in a statement April 14.

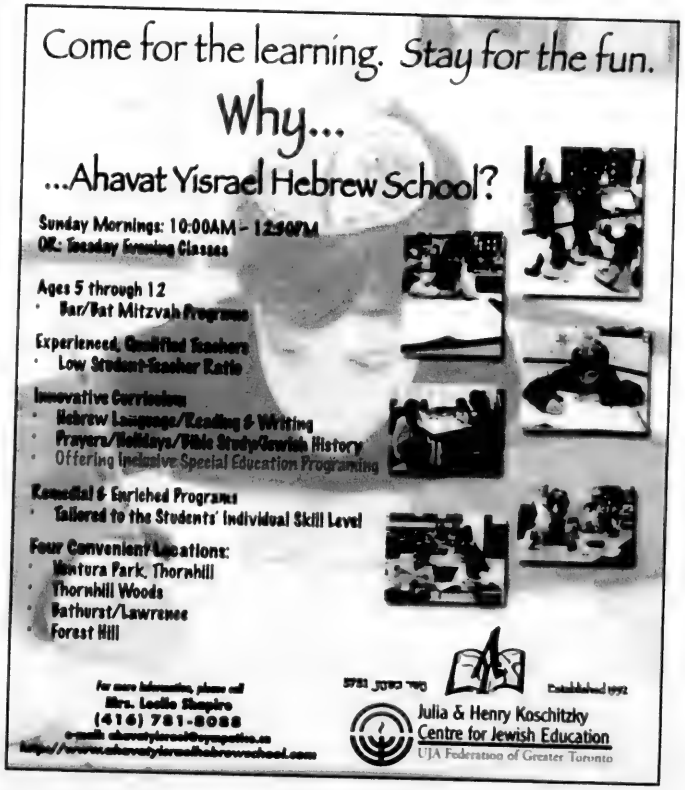
Police authorities in Kansas City had not determined on Monday whether the attacks are a hate crime. The ADL said in its statement that it's working with local, federal and state law enforcement officials as the investigation continues.

B'nai Brith Canada expressed its sympathies to the victims' families, adding that "given the location of the shooting, the reports of shouts of Heil Hitler as the suspected perpetrator... was taken into custody, as well as the fact that it [came] just before... [Passover], this must be investigated as a hate crime. While this appears to be an isolated incident, every precaution should be exercised here in Canada."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said it was taking precautions.

"We have reached out to all three JCCs and the Wolfond Centre, and have arranged additional security for those institutions in the interim," CEO Ted Sokolsky said. ■





OPINION

Passover and recognizing the Jewish state

Gerald Steinberg

The purpose of the Passover seder is to teach our children (and to remind ourselves) of our history and identity as a people and a nation. For at least 2,000 years, and probably long before, Jews have learned and relearned this history, from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to slavery in Egypt, the dramatic Exodus at the heart of the celebration, and the return to Israel – the Promised Land. In every generation, our ancestors asked the questions, recited the answers, and debated the consequences, ending with "Next year in Jerusalem". For those of us privileged to live in the restored Jewish homeland, the thrill of fulfilling this ancient wish never gets stale.

But in recent years, Jewish history and identity have been under assault, as part of the wider war against restored national sovereignty in the State of Israel. In the Arab "narrative", Zionism is a form of "colonialism", and 4,000 years of Jewish attachment to the Land of Israel are erased from history books and television programs. The invasion of five Arab armies in 1948 has become a Jewish war of conquest and Palestinian tragedy (nakba), terrorism is transformed into "resistance," and those who claim refugee status are given an invented "right of return," which would put an end to Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish People.

Most importantly, these myths erase the history of Jerusalem – the centre of Jewish identity, worship and history since it was founded by King David more than 3,000 years ago. The Western Wall is transformed from the remains of Herod's Temple to the site of a fictional midnight visit by Muhammad. The post-1967 rebuilding of the Jewish Quarter of the Old City that was desecrated and destroyed in the 1948 war and the Jordanian occupation that followed, and the restoration of Jewish ownership in neighbourhoods that were ethnically cleansed is attacked by Arab groups and in the United Nations as "Judaization."

In 2000 at the Camp David summit, PLO leader Yasser Arafat told then-U.S. president Bill Clinton and then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak that the Jewish Temples were never in Jerusalem, and, therefore, there was no basis for discussing compromise proposals. Nothing has changed since then – the Palestinian leadership and the Arab League continue to reject any discussion of Jerusalem and Israel in terms of Jewish rights. These myths, and not the post-1967 settlements and occupation, are the main reasons for the ongoing conflict.

More disturbingly, this virus has spread beyond the Middle East to large parts of Western Europe and has gained a foothold at university campuses and some highly politicized church groups in North America. The myths of Zionist "colonialism," Palestinian "resistance," the "right of return" and the "Judaization of Jerusalem" are repeated as justifications for boycotts, divestment and sanctions and other forms of political warfare against Israel.

Every year, tens of millions of dollars are supplied to erase Jewish history, under the facade of support for peace and human rights, particularly by European governments. Dozens of radical anti-Israel non-governmental organizations (NGOs) lead these campaigns. Groups such as Zochrot, which gets money from ill-informed German government officials, hostile Belgium church groups and similar sources, campaign for the myth of a Palestinian "right of return" and condemn Zionist "colonialism." On Jerusalem, Ir Amim and Terrestrial Jerusalem promote the "Judaization" narrative of imperialism, reinforcing the myths and false narratives.

As a result, the Israeli demand that, as part of a peace agreement, the Arabs recognize Israel's Jewish roots and the legitimacy of the Jewish state is essential to ending the conflict. If the myths continue to dominate the Arab and Muslim relationship to Israel, no peace agreement will last, and the engines that propel the wars and terror attacks against Israelis will continue.

At Passover seders, Jews in Israel and the Diaspora continue to teach our children Jewish history. This history is the essence of our collective identity as a people and a nation, and it's essential to our survival. ■

Israel ready for peace, Liberman says

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Israel has proven repeatedly that it is prepared to make peace with the Palestinians, and remains ready to achieve "a comprehensive solution" despite the latest crisis in the talks, Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman said last Sunday.

"We're ready to talk, we're ready to negotiate, but we won't accept any unilateral steps" on the part of the Palestinians, Liberman told foreign diplomats at the Foreign Ministry headquarters in Jerusalem.

In the past, he added, after the Oslo and Annapolis talks, it was the Palestinians who refused to sign agreements, yet world leaders continue to place the blame squarely on Israel.

"What is interesting from our point of view, certain countries and leaders… refused to blame the Palestinians for sabotaging the agreement. After some time… they started to blame Israel, and of course placed all pressure on us."

Israel nevertheless has "proven our readiness to achieve a comprehensive solution, a final status agreement with the Palestinians," and this readiness was "not lip service."

Negotiations have reached the brink of collapse in recent weeks when Israel criticized a Palestinian refusal to commit to further talks past the April 29 end date set when negotiations began nine months ago. Israel then cancelled a promised fourth round of prisoner releases.

The Palestinian Authority, in turn, applied for membership in 15 international conventions and organizations, a move Palestinian officials have said demonstrates to Israel that international recognition for a Palestinian state can be obtained without Israel's agreement.

Israel responded to the applications by instituting a series of financial and governmental sanctions on PA institutions.

Despite the crisis, Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, who is Israel's lead negotiator to the talks, sounded a decidedly optimistic tone on Sunday morning.

"I believe we're close enough to a decision on the part of both leaderships, encouraged by the Americans, to continue negotiations," she told the Ynet news site.

The discussions on returning to the negotiating table were "very complex, not simple, at times with raised voices," she added, but insisted in the interview that "peace isn't a luxury. We need this. It's an Israeli need."

Livni was meeting with her Palestinian counterpart, Saeb Erekat, on Sunday afternoon in Jerusalem as part of the continuing U.S.-led effort to restore the talks.

A bipartisan group of MKs announced that they would travel to Ramallah Wednesday to meet Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in an effort to help overcome the crisis. ■

Spanish village may no longer 'kill Jews'

JTA

A Spanish village is considering removing the phrase "kill Jews" from its name.

The village of Castrillo Matajudios near Leon in northern Spain will convene its 60 resident families at a town hall meeting next week to discuss and vote on the first formal proposal to change the village's name, the regional daily Diario de Burgos reported last week.

Mayor Lorenzo Rodriguez, who submitted the proposal, suggested changing the village's name to its original Castrillo Mota de Judios, which means Castrillo Jews' Hill. He said the name was changed during the Spanish Inquisition.

In parts of Spain, and especially in the north, locals use the term "killing Jews" (matar Judios) to describe the traditional drinking of lemonade spiked with alcohol at festivals held in city squares at Easter, or drinking in general.

Leon will hold its "matar Judios" fiesta on Good Friday, April 18, where organizers estimate 40,000 gallons of lemonade will be sold.

The name originates from medieval times, when converted Jews would sometimes be publicly executed in show trials at around Easter. ■

The Iron Sheik: Popular entertainment company brings wrestler to the big screen

DAVID SILVERBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The multi-tasking brothers behind that bar mitzvah you just attended will soon unveil a pet project harkening back to their youth when they first staged wrestling shows for neighbourhood kids.

Jian and Page Magen of event production company Magen Boys Entertainment are the driving force behind The Sheik, a full-length documentary chronicling the rise, fall and return of The Iron Sheik, a star of 1980s-era World Wrestling Federation (now WWE).

You might remember him as Hulk Hogan's foil, and the documentary's publicity materials plays up the rivalry: "Without the Iron Sheik there could be no Hulkamania," a press release reads.

The wrestling legend, real name Hossein Khosrow Ali Vaziri, hails from Iran, where the Magen Boys first met him decades ago. Vaziri was a good friend of the Magen brothers' father, a ping-pong champ also hailing from Iran.

"We considered the Sheik our uncle," says Jian Magen in an interview. When wrestling matches came to Toronto's Maple Leaf Gardens, the Sheik introduced the Magen family to all the WWF icons, such as Randy "Macho Man" Savage, Jake "The Snake" Roberts, King Kong Bundy and countless more.

Play focuses on medieval religious conflict

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Daniel Kash will perform the role of Cocco, one of the four strong men in Tarragon Theatre's world premiere of A God in Need of Help, by playwright-in-residence Sean Dixon.

The play is based on a true story from the 17th century about four men tasked with carrying a painting through the Alps.

"To put the play in a nutshell is difficult – it is a conflict between church and politics, but in the end it is probably about art," says Kash. "It is set in 1606, Venice, where four strong men win a competition by the Venetian government, to carry a painting over the Alps from Venice to Prague. They don't want to destroy this special painting by Albert Durer. It is a prized religious, Renaissance painting."

Halfway through the journey, the four strong men, who are Catholic peasants, meet a large group of Protestant iconoclasts, who want to destroy the painting.

"In the middle of this moment, one of the strong men, who happens to be effeminate, creates a miracle [when] he brings the Virgin Mother and Christ child out of the painting in front of [their] eyes and then all the Protestants decide to convert to Catholicism."

The play then follows the trial that takes place when a Venetian representative and a cardinal from Rome interview the men and try to figure out if the miracle really happened.

> I don't know if this miracle is true but it is true that these guys carried the painting over the Alps

"I don't know if this miracle is true but it is true that these guys carried the painting over the Alps," Kash says.

The stellar cast includes Greg Ellwand as Cardinal-Archbishop. Alden Adair, Tony Nappo and Jonathan Seinen along with Kash play the four strong men, and Dmitry Chepovetsky is the captain hired to ensure their safety. Daniel Giverin and Ben Irvine are the guards. It is directed by Tarragon's artistic director Richard Rose

"Marco represents the very strong, uneducated peasant, then there is Dolfin who is an actor who just needs some money, there's Rafal who is this effeminate boy who had no business wining this competition and then there is me, Cocco. I'm a mercenary soldier and older than the rest of them. I have been a gun for hire. I am not as impulsive as the rest of them when we are attacked," explains Kash.

"I am really the protector of everyone and when I confront the cardinal, he gives me more respect because I have stood my ground – I am a man of reason. I am sort of the future of humanity as I see things from a scientific point of view. I am a soldier that has survived on my own wits."

Kash says during that period most people were illiterate, so propaganda was often communicated through art, as was the case with Napoleon 200 years later, who commissioned artists to paint pictures of battles preceding his return to France.

The actor's past theatrical experience includes Cruel and Tender, Alice's Affair, Unidentified Human Remains and The True Nature of Love. In film and on television he's appeared in Casino Jack, Skins, Alphas, The Line, Aliens, and Gross Misconduct, to name a few.

Daniel Kash

"One of the reasons I stay in Canada is because here you can do film, television and theatre," Kash says. "I always want to keep my foot in the door in theatre because it is a great mental workout. We should cherish our theatrical environment because it is a very good one." ■

ARTIST ADAD HANNAH EXPANDS UPON "FROZEN MOMENT" IN NEW SHOW AT KOFFLER GALLERY

Vancouver-based artist Adad Hannah has earned an international reputation for his video-recorded tableaux. His new body of work centres upon a "frozen moment" of personal history, a photograph of his mother painting a portrait at an art club in Kodiak, Alaska in 1953 – 18 years before he was born. Through a variety of means, Hannah breathes new life and meaning into the family snapshot.

Adad Hannah – Three Generations (Kodiak Art Club, 1953) opens with a public reception at the Koffler Gallery, Artscape Youngplace, 180 Shaw St. Thursday April 24, 6 to 9 p.m. The exhibit continues to June 8.

Out of Town: Eddie Carmel supposedly stood more than nine feet tall, weighed over 470 pounds and wore size-36 shoes. He was known as the World's Tallest Man. The son of immigrants from Tel Aviv, Carmel lived a normal life in New York until the mid-1950s when a rare growth hormone caused his extreme growth. In April 1970 American photographer Diane Arbus visited him at his home in the Bronx and took some photos.

Those photos are the centerpoint of Diane Arbus's Jewish Giant, which opened recently at The Jewish Museum in New York as part of its Masterpieces and Curiosities series. The photos explore the tension between normalcy and aberrance; many other artifacts and memorabilia are included in the show, including items pertaining to the biblical giant Goliath and the Jewish legendary figure of the Golem. On view to August 3, 2014. www.thejewishmuseum.org ■

Kafka's old strangeness renewed

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Franz Kafka wrote his novella The Metamorphosis in 1912, before his 30th birthday. It was among other early stories that highlighted fathers triumphing over sons, and which presented, along with this outcome, extravagant punishment. His friend Max Brod saw in this creative output something unusual. In his diary Brod wrote, "Kafka in incredible ecstasy. Writes all night long . . . ."

The Metamorphosis was published in 1915 as Die Verwandlung, but Kafka did not consider it a literary triumph. In his diary, not long after its completion, he wrote: "Great antipathy to Metamorphosis. Unreadable ending. Imperfect almost to its very marrow. It would have turned out much better if I had not been interrupted at the time by a business trip."

Like many of Kafka's self-characterized failures, The Metamorphosis went on to become one of the major texts of 20th century literature, in part because of its seeming impenetrability, but also for its hyper-real fantasy: a salesman wakes "one morning from troubled dreams" to find "himself transformed right there in his bed into some sort of monstrous insect."

What exactly Samsa has been transformed into – an Ungeziefer in the German original – is one of the Kafkaesque puzzles associated with the story, and the English language version quoted above is from a new translation by the young, New York-based translator Susan Bernofsky.

Franz Kafka, The Metamorphosis. A New Translation
Susan Bernofsky
Norton

Its cover is graced by a lovely, though mildly grotesque illustration, made of elaborately decorated letters, some sporting buglike legs, arranged in such a way as to form the Ungeziefer itself. This image skirts the famous Kafkan injunction to his publisher that his book should include no realistic illustrations of bugs, beetles, or whatever actual insect one might imagine Samsa to have become.

The Metamorphosis is harder to pin down than some of Kafka's other strange masterpieces. The Castle and The Trial are suggestive of bureaucratic nightmares, of the barriers set up by officialdom, and the abuse of law, which functions in them only to assert its own existence and power. (English translations of these novels appeared in the 1930s, when readers were increasingly interested in totalitarian abuses of power and language).

The Metamorphosis is a purely domestic tale: once transformed and unable to go out on the road, Gregor is a challenge and a misery to his family. Things end, as one might expect, badly. The charwoman responsible for maid duties at the Samsa home finds him one morning and announces, "Come have a look, it's gone and croaked – just lying there, dead as a doornail!" Here Bernofsky's stamp on Kafka's voice and tone is clear; my 1992 Penguin version reads, "Just come and look, the creature's done for; it's lying there dead and done for!"

Translating Kafka presents special challenges. The work's patent strangeness, but, too, its relationship with the time and place of its creation, raise conflicting challenges and possibilities. The Penguin translation of the charwoman's utterance is drab, even characterless, as if the translator sought out an idiom that would be marked neither by place or time. Bernofsky's choice suggests an actual voice, one that is crude and prone to colloquial cliché.

Bernofsky's version readily employs unusual, even risky words – "carapace" to convey Samsa's shell-like back; a "thunderstorm of invective" to describe the talking-to Samsa expects from his boss for having missed work. But in other ways Bernofsky presents a casual, less formal style of delivery than previous translations, and this gives Kafka's prose an immediate and more contemporary tone.

Darkly comic set pieces, like Kafka's description of Gregor's sister's care for him, are dramatic and sharply drawn: "The moment she came in, without even pausing to shut the door – although she always took such pains to shield the others from the sight of Gregor's room – she would race straightaway to the window and fling it open with hasty hands as though she were on the point of suffocating, then remain standing there, however cold it might be, gulping in the air. All this racing and racket was inflicted on Gregor twice a day; he would be trembling beneath the settee . . . ."

An encounter with a familiar text like The Metamorphosis, newly translated, provides a reminder of how translations can smooth or impede our access to Kafka's special form of narrative estrangement. Testing a translation in this context is a luxury; someone else has done all the heavy lifting; an older, more familiar version can be set alongside the fresh one; the reader does his or her best to decide if things ring true. At more than one hundred years remove from its writing, The Metamorphosis continues to offer possibilities for new kinds of strangeness. ■

Norman Ravvin writes and teaches in Montreal. This spring he will give talks on Canadian Jewish writing in Lodz and Konin, Poland.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Sheik's popularity peaked in Hogan era

Wrestler fell prey to drug abuse and career-ending injuries before rebounding on Howard Stern show

So what makes the Sheik's story so compelling to share with audiences? This isn't a wrestling film, Magen says. "He was cast as an evil anti-American character but in reality he's all things American. He fled his country to make a better life in the U.S. and is now truly the nicest guy you'll ever meet."

A quick glance at the Sheik's widely popular Twitter account (413,000 followers), though, might have you reconsidering Magen's "nice guy" assessment. The Sheik plays a character, Magen says, and that attitude now lives on Twitter instead of in the ring. The tweets are crude, antagonistic and intentionally immature. It's an act, something any wrestling fan will truly see through.

Magen says as much as the film will profile the Sheik's wrestling career, it will also show the softness behind the hard mask the Sheik wears.

It's a dream come true for the Magens; they staged wrestling matches in their driveway at 16, paying amateur wrestlers to compete for teen crowds. It wasn't long before the brothers founded their successful event business known for GTA-area weddings, bar mitzvahs, and special shows.

Toronto filmmaker Igal Hecht came on board as director/editor/writer, and the veteran director behind 53 documentaries gets giddy when he discusses The Sheik. "Wrestling is my soap opera, I love it," he says, "and I just knew this would be an amazing film, considering the Sheik's story."

He explains how the wrestler's popularity peaked during the Hogan/Bob Backlund days but he fell prey to drug abuse and career-ending injuries. His rebound was partially thanks to The Howard Stern Show, where the American radio show invited The Sheik to spew his diatribes against other wrestlers.

> We considered the Sheik our uncle
> JIAN MAGEN

Despite the character he plays, the Sheik is far from phony, Hecht says. "He's the real deal, he's authentic. And he still wants to entertain people, which he's now doing on Twitter." ■

The Sheik will debut at Toronto's Hot Docs Film Festival on April 26 at 9:30 p.m., at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema. The film will later be released across Canada in May. The Iron Sheik will be at the premiere of the documentary at the screening, but don't worry, he won't pin you down in his classic camel-clutch.

The Iron Sheik is the real deal.

THE REAL STORY

Jewish puckster is Jewish. Did we mention he's Jewish?

A. David Levine

The annals of professional sport are full of Jewish men and women who have achieved and excelled in the world in professional sport: Sandy Koufax. Half of Amare Stoudamire. The list goes on.

Now, one more young hopeful can be added to their ranks: but hockey prospect Daniel Stone of Squamish, B.C., isn't just another Canadian hockey prospect – he's a Canadian hockey prospect who is Jewish.

Though only 17 years old, Stone – who is Jewish – is already a veteran of the rink, having played hockey since he was four years old.

"Since he could stand," laughs his mom and biggest fan, Mary-Catherine. "We used to catch him stick-handling in the driveway, late at nights. It got strange."

Not long after joining his first pee-wee league, Dan would discover that being Jewish was no obstacle to developing the fundamental balance and agility required to skate. "That never came up," he says, adding: "I'm pretty sure that's not a thing."

At 5-9, Stone – a Jew – may never be the largest player on the ice, but he is the most likely to win a Nobel Prize. When asked about his faith, Stone is proud of his heritage: "My mom is one," he says, "so yeah, I guess so."

After playing two high school seasons with St. Mary's, Stone's puck-handling skills led him to transfer schools twice – first to Holy Trinity, then to Our Lady of the Assumption, where he continued to excel, refusing to let his Jewishness be an excuse for failure.

"You see that more and more," says Mary-Catherine, her gaze sinking.

"Talented young athletes dropping out to become doctors, lawyers, accountants – many of them showed tremendous potential. It's a real shame."

But Mary-Catherine's shame is personal, too.

"His brother's a doctor," she confesses, weeping.

As a child, Dan's inquisitive nature revealed a religious curiosity: "When Dan was 14, he asked why we didn't go to church more often. We laughed and laughed, and told him 'Jews don't go to churches.' And he thought I had said 'juice.' It was the start of a long conversation."

That discussion sparked Stone's interest in all things Jewish, according to his mother.

"He really wanted to go on Birthright, to learn more about his ancestry and heritage."

Unfortunately, the free trip to Israel ended up conflicting with a team road trip that he'd already committed to. "Dan didn't want to disappoint his friends," she says.

"Still, Dan's childhood home was filled with Jewish culture – whether he knew it or not."

Mary-Catherine cites family cultural activities that brought a Jewish spirit into Dan's life. "Dan loves anything with Eugene Levy. Also that Mandy Patinkin show."

And what cuisine appeals to this lansman among linesmen?

"My mother-in-law brought us some of those holiday pancakes one year," she says, probably referring to latkes. "Dan had seconds."

Despite the common belief there are few Jews if any in professional hockey, there are nine, and while Stone has been actively scouted since he was 11, his chances at being drafted by an NHL team have narrowed, thanks to his pronounced myopia and an undiagnosed, late-onset thyroid condition.

Jews are no strangers to struggling through adversity – from Moses in the desert to Mayim Bialik in The Big Bang Theory – and Jewish athletes (like Sandy Koufax!) are no different.

At least that's what Dan Stone is betting on.

But if sheer love of the game counts, then Dan would be a shoe-in.

"This is the game I was meant to play. Flying up the ice with the puck on your stick," he says, "is the closest I get to a religious experience."

And Dan Stone should know about religious experiences, because no matter what the future holds for this young Jew's career, there's no denying the fact that Dan Stone, who plays hockey, is Jewish. ■

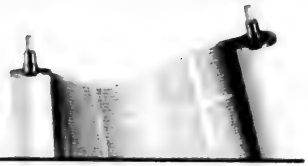
Shabbat Chol Hamoed | Exodus 33.12 - 34.26



Rabbi Aaron Katchen on Moses, Isaiah and seeing the shadow of God
Rabbi Michal Shekel argues our freedom comes with an obligation to offer a helping hand
Rabbi Howard Morrison shares Pesach memories and suggests how we can create new ones

Aaron Katchen

And [God] said, "You cannot see My face, for [humans] may not see Me and live." – Exodus 33:20

The idea of prophecy arises in the reading of the Torah on the intermediary Shabbat of Pesach and Sukkot. We read about Moses re-ascending Mount Sinai to seek God's forgiveness. In the process, Moses asks to see God's presence. He is rebuffed, with the verse relaying that people cannot see God's "face" and live. The rabbis of the Talmud struggle with this verse. They point out that in Isaiah (6:1), the prophet said, "I beheld my Lord seated on a high and lofty throne." How is it that the greatest prophet in Judaism, Moses, is told he cannot see God, yet a later prophet, Isaiah, can?

I have been educated in the methods of Nechama Leibowitz, whose first rule of Torah study is to give every question its space. (Often the question is more interesting than any possible answer). The answer the Talmud presents in regard to Isaiah's vision is that all prophets saw God through an aspaklaria – a type of looking device. Moses' device was clear, and thus he would have died had he seen God. The other prophets looked through an opaque device that prevented them from fully seeing God; they saw the "shadow" of God.

I believe in this context, the seeing that the Torah and Talmud mention actually refers to a full understanding of God. As mere humans, we are incapable of fully seeing/understanding God. But to claim our place as the "children of prophets," we can strive within our limitations to see and understand the shadow of God. Even if we cannot ever see "God's Face," we can aim to see the "throne," God's presence in this world. ■

Michal Shekel

"None shall appear before Me empty-handed." (Exodus 34:20)

A short verse in our parshah brings to light an interesting Pesach connection. After being instructed to redeem all first-born animals as well as our first-born sons, we're told "None shall appear before Me empty-handed." While the redemption of Israel's first-born sons mirrors the destruction of the Egyptians' first-born, the instruction not to appear empty-handed is a bit confusing. As Rashi reminds us, there's no commandment to appear before God with the first-born. The specific text cautioning against appearing empty-handed on Pesach occurs in Exodus (23:15), as well as in Deuteronomy (16:16-17).

Being empty-handed is symbolic of slavery, since slaves have no possessions. A former slave was truly free only once he or she had the wherewithal to fend for himself or herself, hence the instruction in Deuteronomy (15:13-15) not to let the freed slave go empty-handed. The person who left with nothing was merely owned by a new master: poverty. In fact, the instruction to fill the hand of the slave follows the example set by God when we were redeemed from slavery.

Pesach is our reaching out to grasp the freedom God offered us with an outstretched arm. Such a reaction was verbalized by Harriet Tubman in 1849 at the end of her journey on the Underground Railroad: "I looked at my hands to see if I was the same person. There was such a glory over everything; the sun came like gold through the trees, and over the fields, and I felt like I was in Heaven."

Our freedom entails an obligation to hold out a helping hand to those enslaved in various ways. We're obligated to fill the empty hand. Appearing empty-handed is more than a ritualistic faux pas. It's an example of unappreciated and squandered freedom. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Howard Morrison

When I was growing up, my father would jokingly refer to each of his four children as representing one of the four children in the Haggadah. With a smile, he'd refer to me as the Rasha, the wicked or rebellious child. His comment, always made in fun, has stayed with me.

I was blessed to have a close-knit family that gave me many fond Passover memories. To this day, my Aunt Ruth, now in her mid-80s, travels to Toronto to celebrate with me. She's my link to the past, having attended almost every seder in my life. The seder is one of the most widely observed practices across the spectrum of Jewish observance, ideology, affiliation and identity, so Passover offers an integral opportunity to recall old memories and create new ones for new generations.

When I recall the seders of my youth, I'm transported to a joyful time. I remember wine stains on the pages of our family Haggadahs. I remember opening the door for Elijah the Prophet and being convinced by swirling wine in his cup that he had appeared at our table. I recall the challenge of singing Chad Gadya in a quick tempo. Now, as a parent, it falls to my generation to help generate new memories. What new ones did we give today's younger generation at this year's seders? What old memories did we maintain?

Ever since I began leading my own seder after the deaths of my parents and uncle, I've kept the tradition of reciting a Passover poem written by my maternal grandmother, whom I never knew, that my mother read for years. Ever since my uncle died more than 20 years ago, I've also continued his tradition of reciting the Four Questions in his Yiddish way.

Pesach ends shortly. We needn't wait until next year to recall old memories and generate new ones. Every time we observe a mitzvah, we can recall past memories and create new ones. ■

Rabbi Howard Morrison is senior clergy at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Macaroons: a classic cookie

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A true macaroon is small cookie classically made of almond paste or ground almonds (or both) mixed with sugar and egg whites, said to have originated in Italy although the French try to claim it as their invention as well.

Almond macaroons can be chewy, crunchy or a combined texture with the outside crisp and the inside chewy. Adding nuts and/or chocolate and coconut to the recipe just makes them more delicious.

The macaroon is a close cousin to the meringue, but the meringues tend to be crisper and the macaroons chewier. If a macaroon is overbaked, it tends to become dry and crumbly. Most modern day recipes for macaroons include almond paste to create body in the cookie as well as adding a more intense flavour than ground almonds. Macaroons made without paste tend to be light and airy with a delicate crust. French and Italian macaroons are made with almond paste piped into a round shape with frosting holding two macaroons together

There are two key tricks to making macaroons at home. The first is to make the egg white foam with tons of volume, and the second is to have the consistency of the batter such that it doesn't run or spread too much. A spoonful of batter should stay put on the pan without spreading too much. If the batter doesn't co-operate add more nuts or coconut.

Getting macaroons to release from the cookie sheet can be a challenge. Most recipes call for baking on parchment and then peeling the cookies from it shortly after they are removed from the oven. This is good advice: use the parchment paper. You can use a well-greased baking sheet, but you'll have to use a thin metal spatula to remove the cookies immediately upon taking them out of the oven. Be warned – if the macaroons are undercooked, the centres will be soft and gooey and tough to get unstuck from the parchment paper.

If you don't want to take the time to make individual macaroons, try making a macaroon bar type of cookie, changing the kind of nuts you use or adding coconut (note if the coconut is sweetened, you may want to cut back on the sugar in the recipe.) If you feel like it, you can add different extracts and chopped dried fruits. ■

Easy Coconut Macaroons

- ❑ 3 large egg whites, room temperature (room temperature is important)
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. vanilla or almond extract (optional)
- ❑ 1 1/2 cup powdered sugar
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups sweetened flaked coconut (or more as needed)

Grease a baking sheet very well if you are not using parchment paper. Preheat oven to 350. Place the egg whites in bowl of an electric mixer and beat until the foam forms stiff, glossy peaks. Add the extract if using. With a spatula, fold in the powdered sugar and nuts at the same time until just combined.

Spoon the batter onto the prepared pan in rounded mounds. The batter's consistency should allow a spoonful to stand as a mound 3/4-in. high and about 1-1/2 to 2 inches across. If the batter is too thin and runny, add more coconut. Bake for 15 minutes for small to medium-sized cookies, 18 minutes for larger cookies, or until the cookies are a light brown. Immediately remove the cookies from the oven and then remove them from the pan. Let cool on a rack. Makes about 2 dozen.

Apricot Macaroon Bars

Crust:

- ❑ 3/4 cup butter or margarine, softened
- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. almond extract
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups cake meal
- ❑ 1 cup coconut

Filling:

- ❑ 1 1/2 cups dried apricots, chopped
- ❑ 1 cup water
- ❑ 1/2 cup packed brown sugar
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 1/3 cup toasted coconut

Preheat oven to 350. In a large mixing bowl, beat butter or margarine with an electric mixer on medium to high speed for 30 seconds. Add the granulated sugar and beat till combined. Beat in eggs and almond extract. Beat in as much of the cake meal as you can with the mixer. Stir in any remaining cake meal with a wooden spoon. Stir in coconut. Spread the batter into a greased 9X13-in. pan. Bake for 25 minutes.

In a saucepan combine the dried apricots and water. Bring to boiling; reduce heat. Simmer, covered, for 7 to 8 minutes, or till apricots are tender. Stir in brown sugar. Cook and stir till sugar is dissolved. Remove from heat and add the vanilla. Spoon the filling over the hot crust. Sprinkle the toasted coconut over the top. Return to the oven and bake an additional 10 minutes. Cool in pan for at least 30 minutes. Cut into bars. Makes 30 to 36.

Mixed Up Macaroons

- ❑ 3 egg whites
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup ground almonds
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
- ❑ 6 oz. (about 1 cup) semisweet chocolate chips, melted, cooled

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 2 cookie sheets or use parchment paper. In a bowl of an electric mixer, beat the egg whites and salt until stiff but not dry. Beat in the sugar, a little at a time, until the mixture is thick and glossy. Mixture should stand in peaks. By hand, fold in the almonds, vanilla and melted chocolate. Drop chocolate macaroons by teaspoonfuls onto the prepared cookie sheets. Bake for 12 to 15 minutes. Makes about 48 chocolate macaroons.

Macaroon Fudge Bars

Store bought macaroons make this treat easy and simple.

- ❑ 6 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, melted
- ❑ 1 cup unsalted butter or unsalted margarine
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups brown sugar
- ❑ 1 tbsp. sugar
- ❑ 3 eggs
- ❑ 3/4 cup matzah cake meal
- ❑ 1/4 cup potato starch
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups lightly packed quartered or coarsely chopped macaroons (any brand or flavour)

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease 9 x 13-in. pan. In a pot, melt the chocolate and butter or margarine over low heat. Cool to room temperature. Stir in brown sugar, vanilla sugar, eggs, flour and starch. Stir in macaroon pieces. Spoon batter into prepared pan. Bake about 40-50 minutes, until top seems set and is beginning to take on a cracked appearance. Do not overbake. Brownies should be set and seem dry to touch - but there should not be a dry crust around sides. Makes 24. Leave plain or glaze.

Jeff and Brad Lutz: Promoting a sport with brooms

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Recently, the Israel Curling Federation (ICF) toured several North American cities, searching for candidates for a national curling team. This followed the country's reinstatement last year by the World Curling Federation after eviction several years earlier for non-payment of dues. Now the desire for a national team is stronger than ever. And two of its foremost proponents are North Americans – Detroiters Jeff and Brad Lutz who cross the river regularly to play in Canada, one of the world's curling powerhouses. The CJN sat down with them at Windsor's Roseland Golf and Curling Club.

What's your interest in curling?

JEFF: It's not only the strategy behind the game but the great camaraderie. One of the things I learned when I first started was the friendships. You could be playing with a stranger for two hours on the ice and you're a friend for life.
BRAD: I love the fact that it is a mentally complex game, that it isn't just throwing some rocks. It's more of a mental challenge than some people appreciate.

What is the legacy of Jews and curling?

JEFF: I remember my uncle asked, 'How did they treat you?' He said he went to the Detroit club back in the late 1970s and they were making ethnic slurs at him, they were making some jokes and openly doing it, like a country club atmosphere. But we know [discrimination] is still out there. I've seen it on Twitter (about the ICF drive) - comments not only about Jews but also about Israel. But I think there isn't as much of that country club atmosphere.

You're from Detroit, why do you come to Windsor to curl?

JEFF: When I started, there wasn't a Detroit club. My quick story was I got interested in the sport through watching the 1998 Olympics, and I called the Detroit club shortly thereafter and said I wanted to learn. But the club was a paper club. So that's why we came to Windsor. This is home, this is where we feel welcome.

How much interest is there by the Windsor Jewish community and the Jewish community in curling?

JEFF: It's hard to gauge right now. What I've learned is that knowledge of the sport is proportionate with what it is with the public generally. And when the Olympics come around there is more interest. What we're seeing as part of our ICF outreach is a groundswell of people who have seen the sport and want to try it. So hopefully it starts growing at an exponential rate and that's the hope in trying to create a national team.

> There were dozens and dozens of tweets from Israel coming out of each curling match during the Olympics

Some people are saying curling is becoming a cool sport and young people are becoming interested.

BRAD: I would agree. I know that when people ask me 'What's your fun fact' or 'Tell me something about yourself,' one of the first things I say is 'I'm a curler.' And people's eyes light up and they go 'Oh that's awesome, I always wanted to try it.' You know, these are people who are college age or professionals or young adults.

How did your link with Israel come about?

JEFF: It came in two ways. Right around the 2010 Vancouver Olympics I really wanted to reach out to Israel. I did a lot of legwork at that time trying to find who the right people were. And people in Israel were also working on a team. I approached the Olympic committee in Israel and asked if I could be a part of this. Flash forward to September last year when Israel had been reinstated by the World Curling Federation. I reached out to members of the federation. I wanted to be there.

Why Israel?

JEFF: When I look at the possibilities, there's just a special connection. I mean every time I think about what is happening here, what I am trying to do on my end, [is create] a program that could be built off the ground, and suddenly represent a nation, a nation not known for having winter sports. Israel is a nation that holds a special place in all of our hearts.

What are the aims of the recruitment drive?

JEFF: I think if you look at the overall goals, recruitment is never done. A lot of times we don't necessarily know because we're creating this out of clay and we're making it up as we go. But the eventual goal is to build a strong national program from a junior program. At the moment I believe we have enough people for a men's team, a ladies team, and a mixed doubles team. You wouldn't believe the amount of people who have reached out to me. The other day before leaving work I got a call from some random person in New Jersey wanting to try out.

What kind of facilities are there in Israel for curling?

JEFF: Right now there's two hockey size facilities – one of them being the famed Canada Centre in Metulla. In fact that is probably the premiere facility and has been for some time. There's another full facility in Eilat, it's in the middle of a mall, which of course is where you put all great ice facilities! And then in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem right now there is what I'd call figure-skating rinks which are essentially not full-size rinks. Therefore people can learn curling, they're just not learning the game as we know it with a full sheet [of ice]. To say it's in the early stages would be an understatement.

What is the public mood in Israel for curling?

JEFF: From what I've heard from [ICF official], Simon Pack, and what I've seen on Twitter, there were dozens and dozens of tweets from Israel coming out of each curling match during the Olympics. Simon was working with Sport 5 television. They got decent viewership throughout the Olympics. And he's basically simulcasting and doing Hebrew over the broadcast. And we know there's general interest. It gets shown rather frequently because it is a European-based sport and there's great interest in Israel being a European country.

Would North Americans who make the Israeli team have to live in Israel and what are the commitments – citizenship, military service?

JEFF: It's a citizenship commitment. In some cases if you're too young of an age or you're not of an exempt status that may mean military service. I turn 30 in four weeks and I will be totally exempt. I guess there could be some national emergency where they could pull the whole nation together in a war effort but that's extremely rare. In Brad's case – he's 27 – because he's in the 26 to 29 age window he would be on a reserve list. (Dual citizenship is possible.)
BRAD: If given the opportunity I would pursue citizenship. As for the military requirement, from my understanding the instances of people in my position actually being called into some sort of duty is once or twice in the entire nation's history – for example, the 1948 and 1967 wars. (The brothers are still waiting on whether they will be chosen for the team.)

Can Israel have a national team and have the participants train in another country given their warm weather climates?

JEFF: Very much so. In fact if you look at what is working right now on the world stage, Canada is like the gold standard. The whole Chinese curling association was built off of Canadian coaching and Canadian ice. And come 2018 if you don't think they could be winning the gold medal you've got to be kidding yourself. These teams are built to win and they're built to train and they take months off and they go to Canada and they work with the coaches here.
BRAD: From a logistics standpoint, in the short term, it's thought that most of these players are going to be coming from North America. ■

Skill saved lives in the Holocaust

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE

The death in February of Holocaust survivor Alice Herz-Sommer at the age of 110, the subject of this year's Academy Award-winning documentary The Lady in Number 6: Music Saved My Life, is a poignant reminder of two basic facts about life and history.

The most obvious is that within the next two decades or less, there will be few Holocaust survivors still alive. Most were teenagers or in their early 20s when the war ended almost 70 years ago. Now in their late 80s and 90s, they have also left their most significant legacy: their visual and oral testimonies of their wartime experiences.

Collected by the USC Shoah Foundation's Visual History Archive, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, and hundreds of Holocaust organizations in Canada and around the world, these testimonies will be used by historians and students for generations to come and will refute those misguided propagandists who still inexplicably question or deny the Holocaust ever occurred.

A second factor in the life of Herz-Sommer is that her survival for two years in the Theresienstadt (Terezín) concentration camp owed much to her skill as a pianist.

"People ask, 'How could you make music?'" she commented in a 2006 interview with the Guardian. "We were so weak. But music was special, like a spell, I would say. I gave more than 150 concerts there. There were excellent musicians there, really excellent."

In truth, while Jewish parents have long taken great pride when their children become doctors, lawyers, accountants and other professionals, during the war, it was often possessing skills – whether as a musician, electrician or tailor –that made the difference between life and death.

At the end of 1942, as the war in the east gradually turned against the Nazis, and German leaders faced labour and supply shortages, there was a momentary pause in the "Final Solution" to make Europe Judenrein – free of Jews. In the devastating irrationality of the Holocaust, this "pause" kept thousands of Jews alive – a classic example of the rule of unintended consequences.

Just as bizarre, it now seems Jewish survival for a select group was contingent on the basic economic principles of supply and demand, as well as the Gestapo and SS's appreciation of high-quality goods. Thousands of skilled tradesmen – tailors, carpenters, bricklayers, glaziers, electricians, airplane technicians, and textile experts, among other artisans – were highly useful to the Nazis, and in some cases even respected and admired. Their lives were, therefore, protected and saved. In the euphemism of the day, these were the Wertvolle Juden— the valuable Jews.

Among many others, there were Solomon Weiss in the eastern Polish city of Drohobycz, whose wife and three children owed their lives to Solomon's skills as a master tailor; Jacob Frank in the dreaded Lipowa labor camp run by the SS in Lublin, whose ability to produce fine leather coats desired by Himmler and other top Nazis, not only kept him alive, but also secured him unheard of medical care when he was mistakenly shot; and teenager Elly Gotz, now 86, who has lived in Toronto since 1964 and who survived in the Kovno ghetto from 1941 to 1944 by learning to be a locksmith. Gotz later saved himself and his father because of his extraordinary skills as a metal worker and mechanic in the construction of a massive cement bunker adjacent to the Dachau concentration camp.

> People ask, 'How could you make music?' Music was special, like a spell.

Gotz obtained his skills thanks to Dr. Elchanan Elkes, the wise and compassionate head of the Kovno Judenrat (Jewish council). Elkes' most creative ploy was obtaining Nazi consent to set up a ghetto trade school for youngsters older than 12 years of age. Elkes arranged for master craftsman from the ORT School to teach the boys a variety of trades and the girls how to sew and cook. Elly attended classes given by the best locksmith in Kovno and quickly became his star pupil.

During the war, Jewish businessmen, intellectuals, lawyers and other professionals were deemed expendable by the Nazis and perished quickly. Those with skills, on the other hand, were the fittest to survive. Rather than feeling dejected and hopeless as did so many Jews who were trapped in the Nazi tentacles, the skilled artisans sustained a deep self-respect and inner strength that made them feel that life was worth fighting for.

Or, as one survivor has put it, "skill is a strength that heals the soul." In short, skill was a potent force and weapon in these courageous acts of self-preservation. ■

Historian Allan Levine's next book, Toronto: A Life and Times, will be published in the fall.

Who will tell the Holocaust story?

lsarick@thecjn.ca

The Grade 8 students sit there, rapt, as Gershon Willinger describes his improbable survival as a Jewish child born in Holland during World War II.

"We talk about resistance fighters. To me, the resistance fighters are also the parents who selflessly placed their children in care of other people, not knowing if they will see those children again... Just put yourself in the place of parents who were expecting the worst, but hoping at least their children would survive. Think about your parents doing that. It's almost impossible to imagine."

For 40 minutes, the students are forced to imagine the unimaginable, as Willinger describes how, as a five-month-old infant, he was hidden by a Christian family, and then, as a toddler, was deported to the concentration camps of Bergen-Belsen and Theresienstadt after an informer revealed his true identity.

His very first memory is of liberation, he tells the youngsters, when Russian soldiers came to the camp and gave him candy.

Willinger has no memory of his parents, who were murdered in Sobibor. He spent the postwar years shuffled from foster families to orphanages, until he was placed with a childless Jewish couple who, like him, were broken and scarred by the war.

After his speech at Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, the students' questions reflect their struggle to comprehend the depth of Willinger's experiences. "Do you hate the Dutch for destroying your childhood?" "Do you hate the Germans?" And most telling, "Why do you want to talk to us about your experiences?"

"I never thought I had a right to talk, because I was so young. I was a survivor who didn't know very much. Once I started talking about it, I felt I had something to contribute," he answers.

WHAT TODAY'S WHITE SUPREMACISTS ARE WEARING AND THINKING

'I'm not racist. My customers are.'

Britain's watchdog on anti-Semitism protested after a shop selling clothes popular with neo-Nazis opened in a heavily Jewish area of London. The Thor Viking store opened recently in North Finchley, just steps from the office of the British chief rabbi, and is selling the Thor Steinar brand favoured by neo-Nazis in Europe and beyond. "This shop is not welcome here, and the sooner it moves on, the better," a spokesperson for the Community Security Trust told the Jewish Chronicle. The shop's owner insisted he's not racist and only catering to eastern European people living nearby who like the brand.

Mayor agrees with supremacist

The new mayor of the Missouri hometown of white supremacist Frazier Glenn Miller said he agreed with some of the views of Scarlett Johansson doesn't care for anti-Semitism or her ScarJo nickname.

the accused killer of three people at a JCC and Jewish retirement home near Kansas City before Pesach. Daniel Clevenger endorsed Miller in an interview with KSPR news. He said he "kind of agreed with [Miller] on some things, but I don't like to express that too much." Witnesses said Miller shouted "Sieg Heil" after his arrest. Miller has published anti-Semitic texts online and belongs to the Ku Klux Klan. Clevenger gave a more robust endorsement of Miller in a letter to a local paper several years ago.

Call her Scarlett, please

Scarlett Johansson apparently doesn't like her media nickname ScarJo. "I associate that name with, like, pop stars. It sounds tacky. It's lazy and flippant," she said in the May issue of Glamour magazine, adding, "There's something insulting about it." Meanwhile, speaking to Vanity Fair, the Jewish actress, 29, blamed anti-Semitism for some of the criticism she got after becoming a spokesperson for Israel's SodaStream. She ended up resigning from her longtime advocacy role with anti-poverty group Oxfam because of the controversy. ■

BDS: A prof's response

I was very impressed by the article written by Marc Newburgh and Raphael Szajnfarber ("Why we must fight BDS on campus," The CJN, April 10) outlining clear reasons and the rationales for opposing the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaigns that are being supported by student groups on many university campuses. As a professor at the University of Toronto (where the Graduate Student Union has endorsed BDS), I am ashamed that Canadian students would support such tripe without any critical thought or an attempt to gather all pertinent information so that they'd realize that these charges are completely without merit.

Given what is happening, it is time for all right-minded professors who teach in universities where student unions have embraced the BDS movement to begin to withdraw their services, or at least "work to rule." This might seem to be an overreaction particularly since university administrations have virtually universally repudiated any involvement in BDS campaigns. While I recognize and appreciate this support, I would point out, however, that the students who currently support the BDS movement are our future politicians, leaders in business, academics, professionals, and university administrators. Unless the students who support BDS campaigns mature in later life and realize the error of their ways, and I think that this is unlikely, we will find ourselves in a very hostile environment.

I have decided that until this insanity stops, I plan to work to rule. The time has come for professors (and administrations) to react unequivocally and to reject the actions perpetrated by students or staff who support BDS campaigns against Israel. There has to be consequences attached to the support for the racism underlying BDS campaigns, which is why mere rejection of BDS campaigns by university administrators may no longer constitute an adequate response.

What Trudeau said

Instead of working to build broader consensus around support for Israel, Conservative MP Joyce Bateman is using the Jewish state to play politics ("Did Trudeau really say that," The CJN, April 10).

Bateman attacked Liberal leader Justin Trudeau for comments he made to a Persian newspaper, claiming that he wants to "shift away from support for Israel undermine Israel's place in the world by opposing our efforts to defend their right to exist… [and] proclaiming his desire to befriend a radical regime that is determined to destroy the state of Israel."

The problem? Not a word of it is true.

An unedited video of the interview proves that Trudeau never said anything of the sort. He is a steadfast supporter and friend of Israel who has long stood against threats to its security and prosperity, including the dangerous potential posed by a nuclear-armed Iran.

So what did Trudeau actually say?

That "whether it's positioning around Israel or working closely with the United States, [Stephen Harper is] very, very focused on what is going to play well at the ballot box."

He was talking about the Conservative's "megaphone diplomacy" of talking a lot, but doing little. It makes headlines at home, but does not make real progress. This approach has damaged Canada's reputation around the world, undermining our ability to work with others on pressing global challenges like climate change, arms control and refugee settlement.

Trudeau also said that "there are very, very real concerns about the government in Iran that need to be addressed, but one has to make sure that you think about the citizens of Iran and the Iranian government differently. I worry that this is a nuance that this government doesn't actually appreciate or understand."

Indeed, the only way to secure a lasting peace is for Canada to engage with the people of Iran, to let them know that we stand in solidarity with their democratic aspirations.

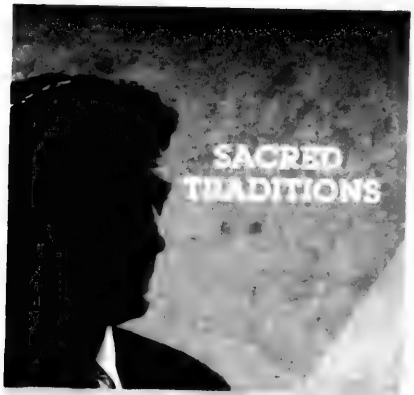
Mature Lifestyles



When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

"They thought of everything."

RABBI-2-RABBI

Being a rabbi is a 24/7 job

But by learning some tricks of the trade and adjusting to the pace, clergy can help bring out the best in their fellow Jews

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

Rabbi Fishman: There are some days when time flies by so quickly that the day is over, and I have to ask myself what got accomplished? I begin my morning with a sense of empowerment and drive to positively and courageously change the world. The next thing I know, I'm dealing with the nitty-gritty of human challenges and upheavals. Yet it's after those meetings and conversations that I realize how fortunate I am to be in such a privileged position to be able to lend a hand and a listening ear. Maybe encountering one family at a time we are changing the world?

Rabbi Splansky: When I arrived at my congregation nearly 16 years ago, my parking spot was already labelled. The sign read: "Reserved for Rabbi Splansky. Day and Night." I turned to my husband and asked, "Is this a gracious welcome or a threat?"

Here are a few tricks I've learned along the way. Each one hints at some aspect of our work and time.

- Schedule 15 minutes to get from point A to point B in the synagogue, so that you can visit with congregants, students and staff along the way.
- Any real study, reading or writing has to happen at home.
- Keep a rabbi's prayerbook and a complete roster of congregant contact info with you at all times. You never know when the emergency call will come.
- Designate a pair of "cemetery shoes."
- Accept that for the rabbi, Shabbat begins at about 1 p.m. on Saturday afternoon.
- Sign up to teach something you are interested in, but haven't yet mastered. It'll force you to learn what you wish you already knew.
- Never underestimate Toronto traffic.
- Replace the word "policy" with "our approach."
- Fundraising is sacred work when you believe in the cause and have a good partner.
- Drink coffee and pray.

Rabbi Fishman: There seems to be no guidebook for what it is that we do. I recall the words of advice given to me upon my arrival at Beth Tikvah: do whatever you can. If you will be successful, then you will be really busy.

I recently had the privilege of taking a group of high school teens to New York for a wonderful Shabbaton. During the day, a student told me that the best part of his experience was being able to have real conversations with friends. I emphasized what Shabbat is all about and what we try to achieve on this day. His response was that he felt so bombarded with technology that most of the time his interactions with friends, through texting or Facebook, were just too superficial. His comment gave me the chance to reflect that this moment was what my job is all about.

Rabbi Splansky: The faculty of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion includes many rabbis who chose a life of scholarship over the congregational rabbinate. Over my five years of study there, I heard more than once and from more than one professor: "It's easy to love Judaism. It's not always easy to love the Jews."

I often think of rabbis as matchmakers. Our job is to connect Jews to Judaism, to introduce Jews to sacred texts, to put Jews together with fellow Jews in a setting that will allow for them to be good to one another, to invite Jews to fulfil a particular mitzvah that they are uniquely capable of fulfilling. We are in a rare position to make successful matches. And when we do, we see our people at their best. It is easy to love Judaism, and sometimes it's easy to love the Jews, too.

Rabbi Fishman: I love the idea of rabbi as matchmakers. I think a lot about this in my quieter moments. I tell myself that although there's a rich and vast array of classic wisdom to be learnt, chesed projects to be engaged with and holidays to celebrate, our community (each individual?) has to be willing to "take the plunge" and come out to be counted.
I think our job is to offer the best of what Judaism is and present it in a way that is both enticing and meaningful. People will then make the choice for themselves as to whether they wish to be involved. ■
